HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1949

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Love divine that stoops to human needs, hear us when we call. We come to Thee with our cares, our problems, and our limitations.

We ask for wisdom and for grace that this day may be fruitful with good works for our country. Our land cannot fulfill its great mission without reverence for those institutions which make secure its perpetuity—reverence for authority, for law, for Thy church of whatever name, and for the rights of the individual.

Do Thou regard our prayer, as we pray in our Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 3, 1949, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on February 3, 1949, the President approved and signed a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 88. Joint resolution extending the time for free entry of certain articles imported to promote international good will.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carrell, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 170. An act to authorize the transfer of certain property to the Secretary of the Interior, and for other purposes.

REORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order today to consider the bill (H. R. 2361) to provide for the reorganization of Government agencies, and for other purposes, that all points of order against the bill or any of the provisions contained therein be waived, and that there shall be not to exceed 2 hours of debate, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and the ranking minority member of that committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HALLECK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, does that include also that the bill will be read under the 5-minute rule?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. HALLECK. It will be read under the 5-minute rule in the regular way?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. HALLECK. That was not included in the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. McCORMACK. That automatically follows. My unanimous-consent request provided for 2 hours of general debate. Of course, after that, if it is necessary, consideration under the 5-minute rule will follow.

Mr. HALLECK. I am not going to object to the request, and I trust there is no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments may sit during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman mean today, or when?

Mr. McCORMACK. It is for today. It is just to permit a brief meeting to report out formally the bill for the consideration of which unanimous consent was just obtained.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. If they have a bill on the floor they ought to be here.

Mr. McCORMACK. It is just so they can meet and report the bill out officially.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

DISASTER RELIEF

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

FEBRUARY 3, 1949.

The Honorable the SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Pursuant to the authority heretofore granted, the Clerk of the House received from the Secretary of the Senate on February 3, 1949, the engrossed resolution (H. J. Res. 136) entitled "Joint resolution making a further appropriation for disaster relief, and for other purposes," attested by the Secretary as having been passed by the Senate on February 3, 1949.

Very truly yours,

RALPH R. ROBERTS,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mrs. NORTON, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee had on February 3, 1949, examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 136. Joint resolution making a further appropriation for disaster relief, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that pursuant to the authority granted him on February 3, 1949, he did on that day sign the following enrolled House joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 136. Joint resolution making a further appropriation for disaster relief, and for other purposes.

TRIAL OF CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'TOOLE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, the events that have transpired during the past few days at the anti-Christian trials in Hungary should awaken the whole world to the true menace of communism.

While we all have great compassion for His Eminence, the cardinal, and his codefendents, at the same time we realize that something bigger than any individual or group of individuals is being drawn through the Red furnace. Here is the final struggle. Here it will be decided whether the conduct of men and nations in the future will be governed by a civilization that traces its beginnings to the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount or whether the governing philosophy shall spring from irreligion, paganism, materialism, and lust.

Mankind must decide once and for all whether the pernicious doctrine of Marx and Lenin with its godless philosophy rejecting the dignity of man is to be the rule of conduct for the world. If we are to accept this immorality, then civilization is through and the anti-Christ has triumphed. No longer will there be any such thing as a free man with a free mind. No longer will there be such a possession as human dignity. No longer will there be such a thing as honor and word between men and nations. Courts of justice will be cesspools of iniquities. The established order of life will be anarchy.

Since this is the future that the Communists would foster upon us and our children, let us quickly accept their brazen challenge. Let Catholic, Protestant, and Jew, all of us whose social and political philosophy springs from a common source, march under the one banner—civilization—to battle until the death the monster that would destroy morality.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'TOOLE] has expired.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] is detained in his district on business. I ask unanimous consent that he may be granted leave of absence for today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARDY]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOLIFIELD asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. FEIGHAN asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include three articles pertaining to Cardinal Mindszenty, notwithstanding the fact that the estimate of the Public Printer is that matter will cost an additional $213.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture may sit today while general debate is in process, during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is going to receive that request, but the Chair is not going to receive many requests for committees to sit during the sessions of the House hereafter.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PRIEST]?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include a resolution adopted by the Illinois House of Representatives.

Mr. CHESNEY asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include newspaper articles.

Mr. DURHAM asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article.

INCOME-TAX EXEMPTIONS FOR CONTRIBUTIONS TO CHARITABLE, RELIGIOUS, AND EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a bill which will raise the limitation for charitable, religious, and educational contributions from 15 percent to 20 percent.

Under the existing law, gifts to charitable, religious, and other institutions are deductible only to the extent that they do not exceed 15 percent of a taxpayer's income.

My bill raises this limit to 20 percent, and thus encourages more contributions.

The loss in revenue will be inconsequential. The bill will encourage private contributions, and thus lessen the demand from the Federal Government for additional grants. I feel that we ought to do all we can to encourage private contributions to our schools, colleges, charities, and religious institutions.

The bill applies to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1948.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of intergovernmental relations.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Delaware?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced a bill in which every Member of the Congress and all other persons concerned with efficient and effective government should be keenly interested. This bill provides for the establishment of a temporary bipartisan Commission on Intergovernmental Relations in the United States, with attention directed especially to the serious fiscal problems with which all levels of government are now so sorely beset.

I want to make it unmistakably clear at this time, Mr. Speaker, that I am fully cognizant of the fact that with the development of our great Nation government at all levels must assume greater responsibilities with respect to the general welfare of the people. The purpose of my bill, however, is to study these needs and to settle upon and establish a logical and equitable pattern or plan by which government, with a proper division of functions and authority, may best discharge its responsibilities to the people.

It is my earnest hope and my request that Members of both Houses of the Congress, and regardless of political affiliation, will join with me in sponsoring this critically needed legislation.

UNITED STATES HELP TO CHINA

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for half a minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the situation in China has reached another critical hour of decision in which the United States cannot be anything but the deciding element as the Central Government will not be able to continue its resistance to and battle against the Communist forces without our help. Granted that China's vastness gives seeming strength to the argument behind the questions: Do you want to bankrupt the United States? Where will you get the money and the goods? But how can we who have declared to the world that we will help those countries that fight for their freedom fail the greatest of them all, especially when so very little will do so very much?

Are we still so naive, so unable to recognize the Communist propaganda to which we are so subtly subjected for what it is? There is no shadow of a doubt about the nature of this army that has reached the Yangtse River, nor of the land reformers with them. They are regular offshoots of Moscow, spreading chaos as they take over. Yet people in high places try to tell us otherwise.

What area in the world is more important to peace, to freedom, and so to the United States as China? What area is more important to Soviet plans for world control? There is no country that has suffered so much from the vacillations and mistakes of our changing policies and our ignorance than this great land of China. Are we going to fail her in this extremity? And more than that, are we going to fail ourselves?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include therein an article on the machine-tool industry and national defense.

Mr. HILL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include two editorials.

Mr. POULSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two separate instances and include newspaper articles.

Mr. LEMKE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an article by Col. Charles L. Hall, which appeared in the Chicago Tribune of Sunday, January 30, 1948.

Mr. REES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an address delivered by Chancelor Mallott, of Lawrence, Kans.

Mr. HARVEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial from a Richmond paper.

Mr. TALLE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. MADDEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a broadcast he made over the Mutual network last Thursday.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor today to remind the House of the great need for additional security for our elder citizens, and to request that action should be taken at once to provide better old-age pensions.

Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that a majority of the people in our respective districts are expecting us to give immediate attention to this matter. Both major political parties committed themselves, during the national compaign last year, to provide adequate old-age pensions and social security. Both parties, and perhaps nearly every spokesman for each party, stated time and again that our old-age pensions should be increased. This problem, Mr. Speaker, is not a partisan matter. Republicans get just as hungry, and just as cold, as Democrats, and vice versa. Republicans and Democrats are working together in this Congress to do something about this pressing matter. There are many questions, Mr. Speaker, on which we may disagree. But on this question there is no partisanship. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have been in session here over a month. We are waiting for committee action for work on this floor. Why not bring forth a bill to provide a decent, uniform, American old-age pension? Why not act on it now? I think we all agree that the need is very acute. It is entirely justified. It is not a partisan question. Then why not let us have action? In the last session of Congress we acted with rapidity to appropriate billions of dollars to afford relief to the stricken people of the world. Why cannot we take action with equal rapidity to provide for our aged people who in the declining years of their lives need our help.

Mr. Speaker, why cannot we have action now?

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and to include a statement by the Iowa Creameries Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

[Mr. TALLE addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes today following the regular business of the day and any special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I first ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Education and Labor be permitted to sit during the session of the House providing there is general debate or the House is not in session.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object; for how long?

Mr. LESINSKI. For this week, for 1 week.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Education and Labor may sit during general debate only if the House is in session.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. If the House is in session and there is general debate.

Mr. LESINSKI. During general debate, and I want to provide also when the House is not in session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT RE COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I also wish to announce that we will continue hearings on the minimum-wage bill this week, including Wednesday. On Thursday we are going into executive session and will attempt to bring out H. R. 858, dealing with the question of overtime on overtime, which is a burning question. We want to forestall any coal strikes that may be pending now or which may happen in the future.

VETERANS' PENSIONS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to renew my invitation to Members of the House who desire to be heard on the pending pension bill to appear before the Committee on Veterans' Affairs tomorrow morning at 10:30 a. m. or to send whatever statements they have to make.

I know there is a great hue and cry against pensioning the old men who went through the First World War and who have now reached the same age, and in the same condition, that Spanish-American veterans had reached when they were pensioned and the same age and in the same condition as the veterans of the Civil War were when they were pensioned.

If we can feed and clothe every lazy lout from Tokyo to Timbuktu out of the American taxpayer's pocket and continue to finance the satellite states of Soviet Russia that are dedicated to the destruction of this Government, then we can certainly look after our own veterans, the men who fought the Nation's battles in time of war and sustained its institutions in time of peace, and who are now old and unable to take care of themselves.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. If we take care of all of these countries the gentleman is talking about, from New York to Timbuktu, how are we going to be able to take care of our own veterans? We are going to have a hard time taking care of the American soldiers if we take care of all of these foreign countries.

Mr. RANKIN. All right, get on my side and stay there. I am opposed to financing every other country in the world, and leaving our own disabled veterans out.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BLAND asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a sermon delivered by the pastor of a Presbyterian church.

Mr. MANSFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include memorials from the Montana House of Representatives and Senate urging the early construction of the Yellow Tail Dam.

Mr. FALLON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by a former attorney general of Maryland.

Mr. GILMER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a brief article from a national magazine.

Mr. GORE (at the request of Mr. SUTTON) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Denver Post.

Mr. IRVING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a newspaper article in reference to Hon. CLARENCE CANNON, of Missouri.

Mr. MICHENER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter.

Mr. JAVITS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in four instances and include newspaper articles, editorials, and a speech.

Mr. WOLVERTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next, after disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and at the conclusion of any special orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

TRIAL OF JOSEF CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I think it is fitting that I should make my first speech on the floor of this House in protest against what appears to be one of the most flagrant violations of human rights in modern history. I rise to reflect the indignation and sorrow of thousands of loyal Americans in my district at the cruelty and travesty on justice of the so-called trial of Josef Cardinal Mindszenty. I shall urge and support a resolution of inquiry as to why our Government should not denounce the cruelty, inhumanity, and injustice of that trial in the name of the rights of man.

THE LEGISLATIVE BUDGET

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up for consideration House Concurrent Resolution 22.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the date of reporting the legislative budget, as set forth in section 138 (a) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as it may apply to the budget for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1950, is hereby postponed until May 1, 1949.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules, having had under consideration this concurrent resolution, reports the same to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

For the benefit of the Members who have come to the House since the Seventy-ninth Congress, and for the benefit of those of us who were here but whose memories, like mine, are clouded, I would briefly review the original legislation and the reasons that are persuasive of the proposed change. The Joint Committee on the Reorganization of Congress filed a report during the second session of the Seventy-ninth Congress strongly recommending a provision whereby the House, soon after its organization each session, could have a comprehensive and clear picture of the proposed expenditures and the probable income of the Government. It would, perhaps, be helpful to quote briefly from that report:

> Control of the purse for all Federal governmental activities is one of the major functions of Congress. Numerous witnesses appeared and recommended various changes designed to strengthen the position of Congress in relation to fiscal affairs.
> These recommendations stressed the need for the adoption each year of an over-all fiscal policy that would consider both the income and expenditures of Government. It was pointed out that the control over revenues and expenditures is divided not only between the House and Senate, but also within each House between its revenue and appropriations committees. Neither of the two appropriations committees imposes any over-all limitations upon its total appropriations before the individual supply bills are voted on by the Houses. Nor do they attempt to coordinate appropriations with revenues so as to fix an over-all fiscal policy for the year.
> With this divided authority existing not only between the appropriation committees of each House, but also among their many subcommittees, and among the revenue-raising committees, how could Congress have a general fiscal policy or follow it if it had one?
> Other recommendations called not only for strengthening the staffs of the important appropriation committees and their subcommittees, but made several suggestions for basic changes in methods of controlling expenditures, improving auditing procedures, and developing better administrative management in Government agencies.
> Your committee agrees that primary responsibility rests with Congress to improve legislative control over governmental expenditures and that means must be provided to permit a closer scrutiny of them, and not only by the committees charged with this duty but also by the individual Members and Congress itself.
> Your committee believes that Congress has not adequately equipped itself to resist the pressure of departments and agencies in behalf of larger expenditures. We have equipped the agencies with ample funds to collect and present evidence to support their appeal for larger sums or to forestall reductions. But we have failed to implement Congress with adequate facilities for scrutinizing these justifications.

It becomes increasingly difficult for a Member of Congress to maintain a clear picture of expenditures and income, and because of this difficulty it is often impossible to make the intelligent decisions on legislation that our responsibilities require.

The House very wisely adopted a provision in the Reorganization Act—now Public Law 601—which requires:

> The Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, and the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, or duly authorized subcommittees thereof, are authorized and directed to meet jointly at the beginning of each regular session of Congress and after study and consultation, giving due consideration to the budget recommendations of the President, report to their respective Houses a legislative budget for the ensuing fiscal year, including the estimated over-all Federal receipts and expenditures for such year. Such report shall contain a recommendation for the maximum amount to be appropriated for expenditure in such year which shall include such an amount to be reserved for deficiencies as may be deemed necessary by such committees. If the estimated receipts exceed the estimated expenditures, such report shall contain a recommendation for a reduction in the public debt. Such report shall be made by February 15.
> The report shall be accompanied by a concurrent resolution adopting such budget, and fixing the maximum amount to be appropriated for expenditure in such year. If the estimated expenditures exceed the estimated receipts, the concurrent resolution shall include a section substantially as follows: "That it is the sense of the Congress that the public debt shall be increased in an amount equal to the amount by which the estimated expenditures for the ensuing fiscal year exceed the estimated receipts, such amount being $———."

Subsequent to the adoption of the Reorganization Act, the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations found it impractical, if not impossible, with the information at hand, to intelligently comply with the act of February 15. They were relegated to a speculative figure which could not be helpful to the Congress. During the last session of Congress considerable heat was generated as a result of an effort to comply with the above provision, and because of the haste and the lack of adequate information the figures arrived at provoked considerable criticism.

It is unnecessary, I think, at this time to consider this from a political standpoint, but it is perhaps inevitable, and while there will be no serious opposition to adoption of this resolution there will likely be considerable debate about the manner in which the legislative budget report was handled during the Eightieth Congress and is presently being approached. Certainly, however, it is very impractical for the joint committee to bring in a conclusive and accurate report by February 15. This is the experience of both parties. The date should be set back.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] introduced this resolution, which, as you see, provides that the date of reporting the legislative budget shall be postponed until May 1 of this year. He expresses the hope of the joint committee that by that time a useful and comprehensive report may be brought before the House, outlining a fiscal framework within which we may work.

It is of particular importance to our economy and the proper discharge of the functions of this Congress that we do not totally disregard this important part of the Reorganization Act. The earliest possible date should be agreed upon for the reporting of the legislative budget as set forth in section 138, Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946.

As so very ably presented by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] on many occasions, the Congress should not abandon its quest for a sound fiscal policy to guide us in our work. We are attempting by this measure to find a workable date, one that will be timely and useful to the Members of Congress, and we are attempting to give the joint committee an opportunity to work it out in good order.

There can rightfully be no politics in the consideration of this resolution and there should be no opposition to its adoption. I believe that I express the majority view when I say it is in the interest of orderly and effective procedure that we adopt the resolution. Experience alone will permit us to agree upon a permanent, timely date.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time yielded to me in connection with this resolution be transferred to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], the ranking minority member of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require, and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Texas has explained, House Concurrent Resolution 22 would amend section 138 of the Reorganization Act so as to make the effective date for the filing of the so-called legislative budget for the coming fiscal year May 1.

I think perhaps it may be well for us in considering this legislation to recall just a little bit of recent history. When the Reorganization Act was before the House, the purpose of section 138 was explained rather thoroughly and I think very well by the sponsors of that legislation, to the effect that by filing such a legislative budget or an estimate of receipts and expenditures early in each session of Congress we would then at least have some figure to shoot at in connection with both revenue raising and tax spending.

In practice, it has worked out that it was rather difficult to make anything like an accurate appraisal of either our revenues or our spending program, because February 15, the day provided in the original act, was rather early. It was impossible in many instances to know what revenues would be coming in, and certainly impossible to know what action Congress might take on the appropriation bills, or even what appropriation bills the Committee on Appropriations might report. As a result, back in the first session of the Eightieth Congress, in 1947, no agreement was reached by the joint committee set up to create and to submit this legislative budget as to what the budget should be.

The joint committee was severely and soundly and roundly criticized—actually denounced, as it were—for failing to meet the requirements of the Reorganization Act. The Republican majority of the Eightieth Congress was, in fact, openly accused of trying to sabotage and destroy the Reorganization Act. The leader of that denunciation, the man who made, should I say, the most rabid speeches against those charged with the responsibility of attempting to work out a legislative budget, was none other than my very good friend and namesake, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], who rather peculiarly now happens to be the author of this House concurrent resolution—wanting to do the very thing for which he condemned his Republican colleagues in the House just two short years ago. It is very, very peculiar what changes just a little bit of time will make in people's viewpoints and attitudes. If I may let you in on more or less of a legislative secret—and I do not want to call it that because I am sure the gentleman did not mean to be secretive—now and then humorous things often happen, even in that terrible Committee on Rules, which has been chastised recently by the Congress.

By mistake, Mr. Majority Leader—for I presume it was by error, and I am sure also that it was not your responsibility in any way—House Concurrent Resolution 13, introduced by the gentleman from Missouri, was presented to the committee. Lo and behold, it provided to just do away entirely with the legislative budget, and not to have any at all, or to just strike out or repeal that section of the Reorganization Act. If I may get confidential with my colleagues, I am not so sure but that that is not the best way to meet the situation. I am certain of one thing: it is the most honest way of meeting it, because when you pass the pending resolution, all you are doing is circumventing—as I am certain the gentleman from Oklahoma will tell you if he speaks on the measure—the intent and purpose of the Reorganization Act by saying, "Oh, we will set up a budget after we know what the tax income is going to be, and after we have passed out most of the appropriation bills and have decided what we are going to spend."

Well, that was not the idea, purpose, or intent behind this provision of the Reorganization Act, I am sure. The purpose and intent of the Reorganization Act, section 138, was to at least attempt to hold down public spending and to hold down taxes and to give the Congress an opportunity, before it acts, to take an over-all look at the annual great, gigantic spending program to see what it is we are going to spend and what we are going to have available to spend.

It is proposed here to make the date May 1, and that is after the horse is out of the barn, as it were.

I hope and I believe it would just be a matter of fair play, if I may express it that way, that the gentleman from Missouri who is the sponsor of this legislation will offer his apology to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]—and I am sorry that Mr. Knutson is not here—and to all those who were charged with this responsibility back in the Eightieth Congress, and say to them in substance, at least, "Well, boys, I was wrong, and I am sorry that I criticized you, because now that the responsibility is mine, I realize that I cannot meet it any better than you could meet it when it was yours. I am here to admit to you that I was playing just a little bit of politics back in the Eightieth Congress."

Of course, I can understand why the gentleman from Texas said to you that we should not discuss this in a political vein. Of course, I am not discussing it from a political angle. But, nevertheless, it was discussed from a political viewpoint, purely and simply, back in the Eightieth Congress.

Here is No. 2 on the list of peculiar legislative flip flops by our Democratic friends. Oh, I remember somebody keeping score on us, Mr. Majority Leader, back in the Eightieth Congress. So, perhaps it is a good time to set up another score board and to start keeping a little score and a little record. But this is back-pedaling bill No. 2 to come before the House. It is either the third or fourth piece of legislation of any kind which we have had before us. But it is the second bill or resolution that has come before the House that in fact approves something the Eightieth Congress did in connection with some particular piece of legislation. It admits that the Eightieth Congress and those leaders in that Congress who were charged with the responsibility of handling the legislative budget were right at the time they were being so soundly and so roundly criticized by my good friends on the Democratic side of the aisle.

In order that we may have a picture of what is occurring here, I have attempted to describe to you what has gone before, including the peculiar past actions of some of our colleagues. As far as the legislation is concerned, I hope that if we are going to take any action at all we will be absolutely honest and actually do the thing that this resolution attempts to do by circumvention or evasion of the Reorganization Act—just repeal the whole section. We either ought to live up to that section or, if it is not workable, then we ought to have the legislative manhood and womanhood, and honesty of purpose and forthrightness with the general public, to say, "We have found out that section 138 of the Reorganization Act is not workable, and instead of trying to kid you or mislead you a bit by setting a date so that the legislative budget means nothing, we are just admitting that the section will not work and we are repealing it." That action would be honest and forthright, but what is done, of course, depends upon the wishes and the will of this House.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I have repeatedly said on the floor of the House, and I repeat it, that I consider the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] the best Republican politician in the House of Representatives. That does not mean to say that there are not other good ones on that side, but his versatility, of course, is known to all of us who have served with our distinguished friend.

In his remarks he overlooked one important factor, however, that 2 years ago the Democrats attacked the arbitrary manner in which the Republican Party undertook to comply with section 138 of the Legislative Reorganization Act. Lest they forget, let me refresh the memory of my friend from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], that instead of meeting it in an honest way, as we are meeting it now, his party brought in a resolution calling for a $6,000,000,000 cut in the budget recommendations. Now, if the Republican leadership had approached it the way we are approaching it, and we had then opposed it, the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], would be pertinent. But we took the position that a $6,000,000,000 cut was arbitrary; that it disregarded the equities and the necessities of specific items included in the President's budget. Of course, every bit of evidence in the Eightieth Congress confirms our position. After the House adopted this arbitrary $6,000,000,000 cut, and, of course, that was done by the then majority party, the resolution went over to the Senate; and the Senate majority party voted a $4,500,000,000 cut. Then the resolution went to conference, and of course it never saw the light of day again. At that time when the resolution was reported to the House and was pending in the House if a resolution along these lines had been introduced, a different situation would have existed; and if we Democrats opposed, I repeat, then the gentleman from Ohio in his "nonpolitical" speech that he says he has just made would have been on more tenable grounds. The best answer is that the gentleman himself admits that this is the honest approach to a situation that we know is difficult for both branches of Congress to work out in accordance with the provisions of the Legislative Reorganization Act at the present time; to wit, action on or before February 15.

As we construe the remarks of my friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN]—and there is no Member of the House more adroit in expression and in drawing the lines of differentiation between logical debate on the proposition and political argument—the remarks of the gentleman are in complete support of the resolution that is now pending before the House. I respect the gentleman in his further statement that he believes that the time limit should be completely eliminated. That may be so; I am not prepared to agree with that today. I think we ought to have one more year's experience, at least; but certainly in his frank way he has told the House and told the country just how he feels; that it is not a resolution, in his opinion, that goes far enough. I am not prepared to challenge that now; but, in any event, this resolution is based upon the necessities of the situation that confront the Congress; and the gentleman's remarks are certainly in support of the particular resolution, which, so far as this particular year is concerned in determining the budget limit for the fiscal year 1950, is a decided step in the right direction, according to his way of thinking.

I rose, however, to set the record straight and to show that our opposition to the resolution in the first session of the Eightieth Congress was based on the arbitrary cut, and that an approach of this kind would have been an honest one and probably would not have incurred our opposition.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, America today is facing a very serious situation. Federal tax collections from the people of the United States in the current fiscal year will run between $42,000,000,000 and $44,000,000,000. State and local tax collections will run nearly $15,000,000,000, and the total will run somewhere around $57,000,000,000. The expendable income, money that can be spent by the people, not the gross income that you hear talked about, but the expendable income, is less than $150,000,000,000. What does this mean? That we are paying today in this country for taxes 35 percent of what is taken in. Is it not about time that we begin to take into consideration what is going on instead of proposing additional taxes to ruin the country?

Mr. Speaker, as far as this particular resolution is concerned, I do not believe it will make the legislative budget provision of the Reorganization Act work. It could not be made to work last year, although we gave of ourselves all the time that it was possible to give in an effort to make it work satisfactorily. Instead of bringing in a subterfuge like this, I am wondering why the majority of the House does not have the courage to bring in a repealer? Every time that we suggested a reduction in over-all appropriations last year and the year before the spenders—those with special projects and other spenders—began to holler. They said that what we were trying to do was to cut down on particular projects that they had in mind.

Why do we not be honest with the House of Representatives and the people of the United States if we are going to do anything about this matter other than to try to make it work the way the reorganization bill provided? Why do we not have the courage to bring in a repealer of that provision?

I could not support this proposition when it was up for consideration before. I stated then just how it would work when the bill was on the floor for consideration. Let me ask again, Why do you not have the courage to face the music?

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY].

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor at this time to express my opinion that the postponement of this date for filing the legislative budget until May 1 this year is not in contravention or subterfuge to violate the intent of the legislative budget.

I also would like to answer the remarks made by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio and the distinguished gentleman from New York that we should in all honesty abolish the legislative budget.

In the first place, there is nothing sacred about any date or any particular time mentioned in the Reorganization Act. The Congress is a fluid organization and any Member of Congress must know that no one can possibly write a bill and the Congress cannot pass a bill that must not be looked at in the light of experience and of trial and error.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The gentleman misquoted me.

Mr. MONRONEY. I would not want to do that for the world. I thought I had quoted the gentleman correctly.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. No. My statement was that we should be honest about this, if this will not work, that instead of circumventing the law we should be honest about it and say it will not work and repeal it. We should take one step or the other. We ought to keep it as it is or we ought to repeal it.

Mr. MONRONEY. Perhaps I erred and should not have said that the gentleman from Ohio takes the same position as the gentleman from New York. The gentleman from New York has been on record consistently since the legislative budget was first proposed in opposition to any legislative budget idea.

The original date in the Reorganization Act for filing the legislative budget, I believe, was April 15. At the request of the Appropriations Committee of the other body that was moved forward to March 15, then at the suggestion of the Appropriations Committee leaders over here, and in an effort to reach a compromise, it was finally made February 15. So this extension now to a later date more or less bears out the original idea that a quick consideration of the important items of a legislative budget are apt to mislead the country and the Congress on the attainment of a factual and a definite budget that Congress can live within.

So I do not think it is going to hurt the congressional reorganization a bit to postpone the date for this year only and try at a later date—I would much rather have a later date—to get closer to hitting the target of the legislative budget.

The accuracy of the budget is more important than to just keep the February 15 date and miss it by $6,000,000,000, as was done 2 years ago. If this mechanism of the legislative budget is to work and to be helpful to the country, then I think it must be as nearly accurate as possible in the light of carefully considered congressional estimates on appropriations and on revenue for that year.

I would like to express myself now on the abolishment of the legislative budget. Its abolishment would tear out the second most vital part of the reorganization of Congress. This was one of the principal things that gave hope to the people of the country that Congress would meet its most important task, and that is, the controls over the power of the purse.

People look to Congress as the guardian of the purse strings, and why the gentleman from New York would stand up here and ask that this mechanism be torn out of the Legislative Reorganization Act without giving it a fair trial, I simply cannot understand.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman mean that we did not give it a fair trial last year or the year before?

Mr. MONRONEY. I will say to the gentleman that the bringing in of a $6,000,000,000 cut in the President's budget on February 15, 2 years ago, was not a fair trial. Even though I was one of the sponsors of the legislative budget, I voted against that $6,000,000,000 cut, because I knew from my experience it was unrealistic and impossible of attainment.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman really believe in saving a dollar?

Mr. MONRONEY. I certainly do.

Mr. TABER. It is about time somebody did.

Mr. MONRONEY. If you will work and perfect this legislative budget as it was intended to be worked, if you put a staff on the legislative budget and study the budget requests of every single department, and follow from the time the desire of appropriation brings glint into a bureau's eye, and follow that request through the budget office of the President down to the time it comes to Congress, you will be aproaching the financial responsibility of the job Congress has to do.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Does the gentleman know that the testimony before the subcommittee of the War Department last year developed that they had $5,270,000,000 in 1946 and prior years' funds available for expenditure which the President did not include in that very budget the gentleman is talking about?

Mr. MONRONEY. I will say to the gentleman that we should have the very finest staff that money can employ for the Congress to know and understand every single budget item as it comes from these departments and from the President and the failure of the legislative budget has been largely because we have not had a proper staff employed for the legislative budget organization.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. And $4,000,000,000 of that amount remains in the Treasury today.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. MONRONEY. The one thing, I think, that we have to realize as Members of Congress is that there are two ends to every budget:

First. How much are you going to spend; and Second. How much are you going to take in?

In a simple analysis of legislative budget we ask that the Congress do exactly as every individual in business does, try and estimate his over-all expenditure and his over-all income, and try at one point in our congressional session to put these two important items in focus.

If we ignore the amount of revenue that we are going to have coming in at the time we try and fix an over-all budget ceiling on expenditures, then I think we are ignoring one of the principal tasks of this job. The Committee on Ways and Means before the Civil War used to handle both appropriations and also the matter of taxation, and they had control at both ends of the important fiscal job of Congress.

Now we have two committees operating in an airtight, hermetically sealed compartment. Under the legislative budget they must meet together and discuss the matter of revenue and appropriations. These two items, and their relationships of income and outgo, are problems that the people of the United States want to know and understand.

They want to know how are we going to balance the budget and how much revenue are we going to have to meet the necessary total expenditures?

The legislative budget should not be abolished; it should be made to work.

I do not yield to any man in my opinion of the ability of this great legislative body. We can, if we try, make a sound and reliable budget, just as capably as the executive department can. We only need to put the best efforts forward in this approach to an improved fiscal control by Congress.

I am tired, as one Member, of seeing our appropriations total grow haphazard as the result of many loosely connected subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee. Our total expenditure figure should be one that is in line with our ability to pay—and only by a legislative budget, taking into consideration both income and outgo, can we do our job.

The suggestion made that May 1 will be too late for any use, is not in line with the facts. A leading member of the Appropriations Committee informed the Rules Committee when this measure was before them, that three-fourths of the appropriations would not have been passed by both Houses before the May 1 date. My own opinion is that not much more than one-third of the money bills will have passed even one House before that date.

It is far more important to set the date forward to May 1 than to abandon the legislative budget. It is more important to change the date than to put up with meaningless budgets hastily arrived at without due consideration.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma. He said that any business concern wants to determine how much money it has to spend and how it is going to spend it. I agree with him 100 percent on that. But he said so much more that I do not agree with much of his arguments. Those in charge of any business do not wait until they have spent all their money and then come with recommendations for new features to their business. They decide what they have and what they want before they start any venture. Those responsible for the operation of any good, sound, business concern first sit down and try to analyze just how much it is going to cost them to run their business, new things they want in their business, and then find out how much money they have to spend in order to determine just what they can do. They determine it almost to the penny. If they do not have the money themselves, they want to know where they are going to get it, in order that they can carry out the proposals they are going to inculcate into their business. They do not start new improvements to cost great sums without knowing where the money is coming from.

Why is not that the sensible thing for this Government to do? That is what this law as it was adopted was intended to do. The Committee on Ways and Means, the Committee on Appropriations, and other Members of the House and Senate were to get together and try as best they could to find out exactly what was going to be required in the way of spending for the year, then they were going to analyze the new things they had, that the President had proposed in his messages to Congress and that the Members of Congress were going to propose in way of legislation. If you propose so much legislation that you are not going to have the money to finance it, and you are going to have deficit spending, then is the time to call a halt, and the report of this committee would be a deterrent to deficit spending.

The gentleman says the Members of this Congress are bright enough, smooth enough, and sweet enough that they are not going to ask for a whole lot of things, but every Member of Congress wants to have something for his own district that costs much money. He is more interested in that than he is in the welfare of the country as a whole. At least it looks that way. He wants to see if he can get appropriations through the Committee on Appropriations and through the Congress, because that will help him in his district.

What has been proposed in the President's budget? The President has proposed some new things. Military pay adjustments are going to require over $300,000,000. Before we start on that, just remember that you have a $252,000,000,000 debt. The President has asked for $41,800,000,000 for next year. He realized that he is not going to get that money, that he is going to be short $855,000,000 from a balanced budget, when he presented all these requests. Someplace, somewhere, sometime, you will have to cut the cost of government and the President's recommendations.

This committee ought to come in here with these things and tell us just what we are going to have to cut out. Then we ought to be big enough to say that we are going to have a stable, sound Government, and are not going to spend any more than we have to spend. It would be a deterrent to too much legislation if this committee would come in here and make such recommendations to cut out a lot of the President's recommendations, or recommendations of Members of Congress.

Universal military training as proposed by the President is going to cost anywhere from $600,000,000 to $3,000,000,000 per year. Changes in the employees' accident compensation rates are going to cost per year from three to four million dollars. Slum clearance and housing are going to take $210,000,000 to $545,000,000 additional per year. Research and administration and losses on loans, although there has been no official estimate as to the cost, are thought by some people in Government to run as high as $2,000,000,000. That is a lot of money.

For Federal aid to education they want $300,000,000 the first year. The second year it will take $500,000,000. The third year it will take a billion dollars at the least. That is a lot of money. Where are you going to get it?

The National Science Foundation will take from $2,000,000 to $100,000,000 per year. Grain storage will take from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 a year. The international wheat agreement will take from $55,000,000 to $70,000,000 a year.

Flood control on Missouri River Basin $4,000,000, and no one knows the final cost; probably like the TVA, it might be a billion dollars.

Health insurance or socialized medicine will run into hundreds of millions of dollars annually.

Unemployment compensation, higher rates and broadening the base.

Steam power plant on TVA—Government in business competing with private enterprise, $75,000,000. Oh, foolish legislation and proposals by the President.

Bureau of Reclamation—rehabilitation and betterment as required by the President will take from $4,000,000 to $12,000,000 a year.

The construction programs that he has asked for, such as the St. Lawrence seaway project, are to take $93,000,000 the first year up to a sum total in 7 years of $3,573,000,000—survey and educational building needs and study for scholarships and fellowships will take a million dollars a year or more.

Then there are grants for scholarships and so on. This thing is enormously important; this ought not to be delayed 1 minute, this report should be here by February 15. It can be done; it should be done. You ought to defeat this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for an observation?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I was very much interested in the statement made by the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] wherein he suggested that this measure was in complete compliance with the spirit of the Reorganization Act. Being a man of peace and one who loves harmony, I would like to suggest to the gentleman that inasmuch as all of the appropriation bills of the House will probably be through the House by May 1, which would, of course, mean that the budget would mean nothing—in order to be certain that he will know exactly what he is going to do that he might well make this August 1 or September 1, or even January 1 of next year, so that he could be quite certain in knowing just where he was.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], who claims the great distinction of being one of the authors of the reorganization bill, in an attempt to justify his position on this resolution, which to my mind very surely represents a desertion of the very principle for which he originally fought, made the remark that the Congress is a fluid body. I am quite sure since he has so characterized all of us collectively as being a fluid body that he would not object to my suggesting that perhaps his position on this matter of the legislative budget is a little fluid.

Let us just take a look at the history of the Legislative Reorganization Act. Great numbers of right-thinking people in the country thought that the Congress of the United States needed to be streamlined, that it needed to be brought up to date in its procedure. So we in the Seventy-ninth Congress, a Democratic Congress, enacted the Reorganization Act. There were three things principally outstanding in that measure which were supposed to be helpful to the country. One of them was that we were to shrink up the committees from 48 to 19 in the House and make a like reduction in the other body. The second was that we were to give adequate staffing to those committees in order that they might have the benefit of expert advice and not be dependent upon the executive branch of the Government for all of our information. Thirdly, we were to adopt a legislative budget.

The Congress, may I suggest to the gentleman from Oklahoma, is in truth and in fact the guardian of the purse strings of the Nation. The Congress itself was to take 45 days to sit down, the House cooperating with the Senate, to determine first of all what the revenues could reasonably be expected to be during the coming year, and then to say, "Here is what we propose to spend."

It was assumed, I am quite sure, that those targets would be set and that then the Congress would go to work to try to fit the cloth to the pattern.

Now, what have we already seen? First of all, it fell to the lot of the Eightieth Congress to put the Reorganization Act into effect. I have said before, and what has here transpired today lends additional strength to my statement, that if the Eightieth Congress had not been a Republican Congress the provisions of the reorganization bill would never have been put into effect. You would not have had a shrinking up of committees; you would not have provided for an adequate staffing of those committees, and you would not have undertaken to comply with the requirements for a legislative budget.

In the Eightieth Congress we did put the Reorganization Act into effect. We did not change it in any one single essential feature. We strove to comply with all of its provisions, including the legislative budget.

It is true that in the first session the House and Senate did not finally agree in conference, but the Members of the House and the Members of the Senate at least had courage enough to grapple with the problem and to each state its views as to what the revenues would be and what the expenditures should be.

In the second session we did get out a legislative budget. We did say what we expected would be taken in and how much we should cut expenditures. And let me say to the membership, many of whom were not here in the Eightieth Congress, unfortunately, that we not only announced a legislative budget in the second session, but we lived up to that legislative budget, and we saved billions of dollars to the taxpayers of this country by cutting out unnecessary waste and extravagance.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Coming back to the statement that I made when the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] yielded to me, I have in my possession a detailed statement which I obtained from the War Department after 2 years of work with investigators. This statement shows that the War Department had $5,270,000,000 in 1946 and prior years funds available for expenditure at the time when the budget was submitted to the Legislative Budget Committee by the President. That budget which was submitted by the President to the Legislative Budget Committee did not contain this $5,270,000,000 which was available to the War Department for expenditure. Four billion dollars of that sum remained in the Treasury, either through rescission or refusal to reappropriate. The balance of $1,270,000,000 was obligated by the War Department. Part of these funds were used by the War Department in building those $74,000 houses for Army officers in Alaska.

Mr. HALLECK. Now, may I say that in my opinion the legislation before us today is a subterfuge, a face-saving device, calculated to permit my friends on the majority side from meeting the responsibility that they themselves imposed on themselves when they had control in the Seventy-ninth Congress. I do not think it is an honest attempt, and this is why it cannot be honest, and the argument of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], amazes me: By May 1, if I understand the timetable correctly, most of the appropriation bills will be through the House of Representatives and will have been acted upon. If that is true, what is the use of kidding ourselves by saying that making this May 1 we are going to make a determination. The fact of the matter is you have not even had a committee meeting to try to arrive at a legislative budget. You have not turned a wheel to try to meet the responsibility that you imposed on yourselves.

May I say further——

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I cannot refrain from yielding to my good friend from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman is well informed that in very few sessions have we been able to get out a majority of the appropriation bills, and when we did they would remain in the other body for an additional 2 months; so that there is ample time.

Mr. HALLECK. Now, you see, that is just some more of the earlier apology for this completely indefensible action you are taking here today.

May I say to the gentleman from Illinois that while action may not be completed in the other body on appropriation bills we over here have the first responsibility on appropriations and we ought to have before us the legislative budget in order that we may proceed to cut the cloth to fit the pattern. If there ever was a time when we ought to have that guidance it is now when we are confronted with demands for additional expenditures of billions and billions of dollars. I am afraid that too many of my Democratic friends are already demonstrating that they have no real intention to cut expenditures or balance the budget. Somewhere a line must be drawn on what we can take out of the economy and not destroy it. If the Democratic majority were not busy welching on its responsibility to determine the legislative budget, a good beginning could be made.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include certain newspaper excerpts; and to include in 7½-point type remarks made at the time of the adoption of the law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the Legislative Reorganization Act was approved by the President in 1946. It provided for reduction in the number of committees, for increased congressional personnel, for the abolition of investigating committees and special committees, for the transfer to other agencies of private bills, for the control and registration of lobbyists, for the discontinuance of executive hearings by committees, for committee procedure in the consideration and reporting of bills, and for budgetary control through a joint Committee on the Legislative Budget consisting of the two taxing committees and the two spending committees of the two Houses.

No action of the Seventy-ninth Congress met with wider acclaim or more general approval. The bill passed both Houses by an overwhelming vote and was warmly endorsed by the press of the Nation.

But from the beginning the statute was singularly ineffective. In no instance, and in no respect, did it realize expectations and in no instance did it achieve the objective for which it had been drafted.

Now in its third year we can look back and appraise its effect in the light of comprehensive experience.

Through the association of frequently the most incongruous jurisdictions, it drastically reduced the 81 standing committees of the House and Senate to 146 subcommittees. As the United Press said, "The Senate instead of having 33 full committees as it had before the consolidation now has 15 committees and God knows how many subcommittees." The Senators who complained of having so many committees meeting at the same time now have more subcommittees meeting at the same time.

The Act was especially intended to eliminate special committees. But special committees have been created by both Houses in violation of both the spirit and letter of the law. The Senate after extended debate began by perpetuating the War Investigating Committee as a special group outside the committees authorized by the Reorganization Act and continued the practice. The House voted 269 to 100 to establish a seven-man committee to study the shortage of newsprint and later voted 270 to 92 to set up a nine-member committee on small business. The Commitee on the Disposition of Executive Papers with all its onerous duties followed.

So, in effect, this provision of the Reorganization Act which was perhaps stressed as strongly as any in the entire bill has been completely nullified.

It still exerts, however, one untoward effect. There are 47 men now serving in the two Houses, 29 men in the House and 18 in the Senate, who have been deprived of chairmanships which they have earned and to which they are entitled. And the same number of men on the other side of the aisle have been denied ranking minority assignments on committees through the operation of the act. They do the work and carry the responsibilities of a full committee. They have rendered efficient and distinguished service and are entitled to a chairmanship. But submerged in a subcommittee they are denied the recognition which they and their constituencies should have. Under this system able men may come to Congress and work for years and then retire without ever having reached a chairmanship. It is not only unjust to the Member but it does not contribute to the best interests of the Congress or the Nation.

And we were to be relieved of "trivia." Section 121 of the Reorganization Act was designed to relieve the membership of the burden of handling private bills. Such bills were to be delegated to administrative and judicial agencies. How has it worked? On the first day of last June the House had passed 187 private bills and 167 public bills. And the House, after 2 years, is still carrying the private calendar and in the last session was calling up private bills every 2 weeks.

The Reorganization Act also carried provisions prohibiting legislation by conference committees, the reporting of bills by a committee without majority vote, dictatorial action of a committee chairman contrary to the wishes of his committee, and similar well-established procedures. All such provisions are mere padding as all of them have been embodied in the law and practice of the House from a time when the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.

The act banned closed sessions. Open hearings were to be the rule. And yet both the Ways and Means Committee and the Committee on Appropriations, for example, have continued closed sessions. I do not recall a single open session by the committee, or any subcommittee, of the Committee on Appropriations since the law was enacted. Like all other provisions of the act the inhibitation of executive sessions is honored by its breach.

Another of the reforms to be instituted by the Reorganization Act was the control of lobbyists. They were to be required to register and in that way the evil was to be eradicated or at least reduced to inoccuous proportions. The newspapers report that during the entire Eightieth Congress, and with increasing activity in the Eighty-first Congress, the lobbyist has flourished as a green-bay tree. There are said to be more high-powered, high-priced lobbyists in Washington today with larger expense funds at their disposal than ever before. And so far as can be noted by the casual observer they have not been affected by the Reorganization Act in the slightest.

The National Legionnaire, in commenting on this section of the Reorganization Act, said:

> American Legion legislative representatives registering under the new Lobbying Act describe it as a weak and flexible measure denying the public a true picture of expenditures and they proposed legislation requiring complete financial statements such as those furnished by the Legion for decades.
> John Thomas Taylor, national legislative director of the American Legion, one of three to register, condemned the section of the act as being a "camouflaged works which is an insult to the intelligence of the American citizen, whom it would deceive."
> "This section," Director Taylor charged, "is a farce, which enterprising lobbyists must praise as they gleefully behold the many loopholes.

Although the Reorganization Act was launched with the universal approval and commendation of the press, the failure of the law to effect economy or increased efficiency has been so marked that its most ardent editorial advocates have become critical.

For example, the United States News, which strongly championed its enactment, says:

BRAKES ON SPEED-UP PROGRAM AS SUBCOMMITTEES RISE, BUDGET LAGS—LITTLE CHANGE IN OUTPUT OF LAWS DESPITE $5,000,000 A YEAR FOR EXPERT ASSISTANCE

The Eightieth Congress is remodeled and streamlined for efficiency. It has $5,000,000 a year in new experts and technicians, all sorts of new controls and machinery designed to put lawmaking on a scientific basis. But a careful study of its work indicates that Congress is going along in about the same old way.

An investigation shows:

Legislative output is about on a par with that of other Congresses.

The legislative budget, designed to bind together governmental income and outgo controls, is caught in a dispute and all but forgotten. Appropriation and tax bills are moving as usual.

A streamlined committee system is now filling the Capitol with subcommittees, and, in some cases, this new committee system is adding another layer of red tape to the legislative processes. More red tape, no greater output.

Lobbyists, who were to be controlled, still are busy in committees and at the nightly social affairs of the Capital.

BUDGET TANGLE

The legislative budget was designed to bring the spending and taxing committees of Congress together for a study of the Nation's fiscal situation and for agreement upon over-all spending and taxing policies. A figure for total spending would be set and appropriation bills cut to fit that total. Taxes would be fixed accordingly.

But House Republicans demanded a $6,000,000,000 cut in the budget President Truman submitted, so as to assure tax reduction. Senate Republicans wanted a smaller cut, and there was dispute over how much should go toward retirement of the national debt.

In the midst of that row, the legislative budget mired down. It now rests in a joint committee of Senators and Representatives. Meanwhile, taxes are going in one direction and appropriation in another.

FROM COMMITTEES TO SUBCOMMITTEES

Streamlining trimmed off about three-fifths of the old committees. Each committee was expected to do whatever investigating was needed in its own field.

But the streamlining left 47 Senators and Representatives who otherwise would have been committee chairmen without any committees to head. The first breaks in the reorganization plan came with the creation of special investigation committees; for national defense and small business in the Senate; for supply of newsprint and small business in the House.

After the committees were organized, the dam broke. The new committees were large, and dealt with many subjects. And there were about 40 chairless would-be chairmen. The committees broke into huddles of subcommittees. In the House, some committees have 10 or 12 subcommittees. Members who used to go from one committee meeting to another now go from one subcommittee meeting to another.

This new technique in some cases is tending to add another layer of red tape to congressional procedure. Under the old system, the committee that prepared a bill brought the measure to the floor, directly. Now the first group to handle a bill usually is a subcommittee, and the product has to be approved by the full committee before going to the floor.

If the chairman insists upon a meticulous study by the full committee before approval, the work of the subcommittee is gone over from end to end, amounting to a double job.

In like vein the Washington Times-Herald commented:

Congress is bidding fair to reorganize itself into a state of utter confusion. If it continues to streamline and simplify at its present pace, it will become so complicated and unwieldy that another city will have to be built just to house the overflow subcommittees.

The major idea behind reorganization was to cut down the committees to a practical minimum; to avoid overlapping and duplication of effort. This was very laudible, because there was almost as much duplication hereabouts as duplicity.

The actual result, however, seems to be that Congress has merely gone from confusion to chaos. Although the regular standing committees have been reduced materially, five subcommittees now bloom where only one was a blooming nuisance before.

Take the House Army and Navy Affairs Committees as a notable example. Theoretically, they have been merged into one committee on the Armed Services. But whereas there were these two committees before, now this merged committee has 12 subcommittees.

The Army and Navy Committees had a room each under the old order. The merged committee now takes up two committee rooms and nine suites—practically one entire corridor of the old House Office Building.

The number of standard committees in the House was cut from 49 to 19, but there is less room now than ever before. In fact, nearly a month after the reconvening of Congress, upwards of 20 members still are without offices and are forced to transact their business at make-shift desks stuck in the corners of caucus rooms or storerooms.

These officeless statesmen have literally been reorganized out of a joint they can call their own. It seems every possible bit of space around the Capitol and environs is occupied by a subcommittee on something or other.

Unless something is done, very few members will ever have any clear idea of proposed legislation. It used to be that a bill was threshed out in its entirety before the full standing committee. The committee then was able to present it in fairly clear form to the entire body. Every member of the committee, if he had listened carefully and intelligently, had a good idea of the picture as a whole.

Let us again take the merged military committee as an example. Its twelve subcommittees are composed of 10 members each, who consider various phases of the proposed bill. The net result is that the full committee never gets to hear the full legislation.

But of all the unworkable and impracticable provisions of the Reorganization Act, the section providing for a legislative budget is the most unworkable and impracticable.

And may I say, Mr. Speaker, that the legislative budget has had a fair trial. I want to extend my compliments to the gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations last Congress, and Senator BRIDGES, chairman of the Appropriations Committee in the Senate, on their efforts to make it work. They gave it a fair trial and they made every effort to get results.

So far as I am personally concerned, let me say that I have not changed my position as was intimated here. In the last Congress I introduced this same resolution, and it was pigeonholed.

I introduced also in this session a resolution providing for the suspension of this section pending further study and I am glad to note that the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] agree with me that the section should be taken out of the law.

Why did we not press that resolution instead of the pending resolution? Because the leadership on that side of the House has repeatedly issued releases to the press in the last 2 or 3 weeks in which they said emphatically they would fight to the death any effort to abolish the provision. Rather than engage in a partisan contest, on a matter on which there should be no partisanship, we then proposed this resolution with the thought that it would meet with general approval.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I regret that I do not have the time, but I shall be glad to entertain an interruption by my beloved friend from Pennsylvania at some other time.

Mr. Speaker, of all of the unworkable and impracticable provisions in the Reorganization Act none is so unworkable and impracticable as the legislative budget. We have tried it. We gave it every opportunity. It cannot be made effective. We can no more expect success, Mr. Speaker, with this well-meant but hopeless proposal than we can expect a verdict from the jury before it has heard the evidence.

How can we judge the correctness of this mass of estimates? The Government has been working on its preparation for more than a year. It is a book the size of an unabridged dictionary. It is possible there are proposed expenditures in there which ought to come out. It may be there are others which should be included. But, how can we tell without studying them? How can we reach a dependable over-all figure? It is absolutely impossible. It cannot be done, gentlemen, try as we may.

If under the proposed system you fix the date early enough to affect expenditures there is no time in which to hold hearings and arrive at a dependable conclusion. If on the other hand you delay the date until after hearings have been held the bills will already have been passed and it is too late to affect them.

Let us take up the bill itself with this problem before us.

Section 138 created a Joint Committee of Congress on the Legislative Budget consisting of the two taxing committees—Ways and Means of the House and Finance of the Senate—and the two appropriating committees of Congress—Appropriations of the House and Appropriations of the Senate. The combined membership of these four committees is 104.

The law requires this joint committee to report to the respective Houses of Congress not later than February 15 of each year a legislative budget for the next year including the estimated over-all Federal receipts and expenditures. They are also required to report a recommendation as to the maximum amount to be appropriated for expenditure in the next year with a reserve for emergencies if deemed necessary. If there is an estimated surplus, the joint committee has to make a recommendation for a reduction in the public debt. Nothing is said about a decrease in taxes. The law leaves no choice to the joint committee as to the disposition of the surplus; it ties their hands in favor of debt reduction.

The controversial nature of the action under section 138 comes from the requirement that the joint committee accompany their report with a concurrent resolution proposing adoption of the legislative budget and fixing the maximum amount to be appropriated by Congress at that session for expenditure in the next fiscal year. Nothing is said about a limit on appropriations for the subsequent fiscal years which might conceivably be an important factor in the financing program of those years. If there is an estimated deficit instead of a projected surplus, the concurrent resolution is to contain a declaration that it is the sense of Congress that the public debt should be increased by the amount of the deficit. Again it ties the hands of the joint committee as to the manner of meeting the deficit. A recommendation for new taxation or partial new taxation and partial increase in debt would not suffice.

There is no clarity as to what Congress intended in section 138 by the legislative budget. Did it envision the complete make-up of the present appropriation bills in final detail? Did it hope for one consolidated appropriation bill? Did it contemplate only a schedule of the items in general? Or did it intend simply an allocation of available revenue in general lump to each of the departments and other agencies? The only definite expression in the section is that it shall be a legislative budget and include the estimated receipts and expenditures and recommend a maximum limit on the total to be appropriated for expenditure in the ensuing year.

The outside date fixed for reporting the legislative budget is February 15 of each year. This automatically precludes a detailed budget because it could not be made ready by that time. If it envisioned only schedules of items or allocations by agencies those could only soundly be reached by consideration of the details which comprise the whole and again the dead line of time defeats practical compliance. A consolidated appropriation bill is ruled out for the same reason. The upset date contributes to make section 138 action the vehicle of the cleaver instead of the scalpel.

As will be noted, the over-all budget figure, even when finally adopted, is not mandatory. It is not binding in any respect. It establishes no statutory limitation on the Federal budget or on the amount appropriated by Congress or on expenditures. It is merely the expression of a pious hope, which Congress may disregard, and which Congress has invariably disregarded.

The plan is wholly impracticable. A figure was finally adopted in the last session. But has any Member of the House ever heard it referred to in connection with any appropriation bill? After the legislative budget was adopted in the Eightieth Congress we passed all the supply bills carrying innumerable items and billions of dollars. Was the over-all figure ever considered or referred to at any time during the consideration of these bills? After its adoption by the House and Senate it was never heard from again. If adopted in this Congress it will not be taken into consideration in the preparation and passage of a single appropriation bill. It is wasted time and effort. Try as we may, give it our wholehearted support, and it is still a dead letter. It cannot be made effective.

We take the time of a committee of 104 busy men, at a particularly busy time in the session and we expend, in printing and other expenses incident to the passage of a legislative budget, over $31,000, as we did in the last Congress. And at the end of the session there is no advantage of any kind to compensate for the expenditure of time or money.

Permit me to quote from men whose opinion should have some weight in such matters: Here are comments taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

OPINIONS

Mr. BROWN. The provision is of no great value. We cannot fix this early in any congressional session with any accuracy just what the spending requirements will be. If we wait until later there will be no necessity of fixing the ceiling because it will already have been fixed by the votes on appropriation bills.

Mr. TABER. Impossible to take the figures herewith submitted and arrive at any conclusion which will jibe with appropriations that so far have been made and which will be made in the rest of the session. That part of the Reorganization Act was a mistake. It is not binding on the Congress and is not a satisfactory guide to what might result. The whole thing is a stab in the dark.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. This requirement has proved itself to be impracticable.

Senator BRIDGES. The Legislative Reorganization Act became a law August 2, 1946. It directed the four House and Senate Revenue and Appropriation Committees to recommend to their respective Houses a legislative budget for the ensuing fiscal year. Such report to contain a recommendation for the maximum amount to be appropriated for expenditure in that year.

As the act is now written I do not believe that the legislative budget will ever be more than a pregame guess at the final score. It asks the Joint Budget Committee to give its estimates of a multitude of new facts, figures, conditions, and requests with which it has had little or no time to become acquainted.

Actually, long and detailed hearings are necessary if we are to have a realistic picture of the proper relationship between revenues, appropriations, expenditures, and debt reduction.

Senator TAFT could claim no more for it than an intelligent guess, while Representative RAYBURN, of Texas, House Democratic leader, said all that was done was to "pick a figure out of the air."

These comments do not come from men lacking responsibility. From the joint committee's report, many are from men in positions of high responsibility and leadership. They do not want deliberately to confuse, yet they are required by law to perform a duty which leads nowhere.

The press of the country is in a large measure in agreement with this view. The Washington Star, one of the great papers of the Nation, which has consistently supported efforts to achieve a workable legislative budget, said editorially:

BUDGET CUTTING BY GUESSWORK

The manifest irresolution with which the Senate resolved to cut President Truman's budget by two and a half billion dollars is understandable. The Senate was making a necessary gesture, in accordance with provisions of the Legislative Reorganization Act, but the report of the Joint Legislative Budget Committee makes it plain that the gesture should not be taken too seriously.

The committee, for its part, tossed its budget reduction recommendation into the Senate's lap with a warning that it was little more than a figure grabbed out of a hat. Chairman BRIDGES of the joint committee put it this way in his report: "As the act is now written, I do not believe that the legislative budget will ever be more than a pregame guess at the final score." The law, he pointed out, requires the committee to give its estimate "of a multitude of new facts, figures, conditions, and requests with which it has had little or no time to become acquainted."

When the legislative budget plan was first tried out last year, the committee made a sincere effort to get the facts, holding hearings at which the Budget Director was a witness. But Senate and House were unable to agree whether the President's budget should be slashed six billions or four and a half billions, and the plan ultimately failed. This year the committee did not even bother to hold hearings. Not even the Budget Director was questioned. The committee just made a guess and handed it to Congress on a take-it-or-leave-it basis.

It would not be fair, however, to criticize the committee for this casual attitude toward a matter of such moment to the country. As Chairman BRIDGES stressed in his report and as others at the Capitol have said before him, it is just expecting too much to require a newly constituted group of more than a hundred legislators to submit an intelligent report before the February 15 dead line fixed by law. This cumbersome group of changing membership has found it impossible to study, analyze, and report on a fifteen-hundred-page budget in the few weeks allowed.

The Star also carried an article analyzing admirably the entire situation:

Although the La Follette-Monroney Act reorganizing the Congress is properly regarded as a forward-looking piece of legislation, it is becoming increasingly clear that at least one of its provisions is of dubious value. This is the section directing Congress to establish a legislative budget.

Under this portion of the act the committees which handle revenue bills and the committees which handle appropriation bills in each House are required to meet at the beginning of each session of Congress. After consultation and consideration of the budget recommendations of the President these committees are directed to report to their respective Houses an estimate of receipts and expenditures. The difficulty with this section is that it requires this report to be filed on February 15 and to contain a recommendation for the maximum amount to be appropriated. The recommendation is to be accompanied by a resolution adopting the budget and fixing a ceiling on the forthcoming appropriations.

Until the passage of the La Follette-Monroney Act the preparation of the Federal budget was considered a purely executive function. The itemized list of proposed appropriations for each department and agency of Government is transmitted by the President to Congress on the day after his message on the state of the Union. This, of course, does not mean that the executive budget is binding upon Congress since in passing appropriation bills either House can revise or reject any item contained in it. It did mean, however, that with respect to any reductions made by Congress the agency affected had been afforded an opportunity for a hearing before both the House and Senate Appropriation Committees and a consideration of its case on the merits. The only aspect of finality to the President's recommendations is that no agency may ask its subcommittee on appropriations for an amount in excess of his budget estimate.

As a result of the limited period available to Congress to frame a budget, the joint committees are now compelled to act without an opportunity for scientific appraisal of the merits of the particular items. Consequently the budgetary proceedings in the House and Senate and in the Republican caucuses have been distinguished more for partisan prejudice than for sober legislative thought. While informed persons would agree that with the cessation of hostilities it became incumbent upon the President and Congress to adhere to a budget which would bring about a significant reduction in the national debt, apparently the majority leaders in Congress have given little or no thought to the question of whether the best way of attaining this was to cut expenditures or to increase the tax rates. Instead the Republicans accepted as party gospel the theory that Federal expenditures were much too high and that the President's budget could be reduced anywhere from $6,000,000,000 to $4,000,000,000.

Inasmuch as the Republican leadership in both branches took the position that the joint legislative budget committees were justified in making such a recommendation without disclosing specific items in the present budget which are to be reduced or omitted, it is apparent that both the six billion and the four billion figures were picked out of the air. The only approximation which either of these figures bears to the arithmetic of the problem is that if Representative Knudsen, the new chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, is permitted to carry out his pledge of a 20-percent reduction in income taxes, the estimated loss to the Treasury would be close to $4,000,000,000.

Of course, it is understandable that after long years of frustration, apostles of economy in government are naturally resentful of a budget of $37,000,000,000. But to strike out blindly without considering the merits of the functions which the Federal Government would necessarily have to abandon under the proposed legislative ceiling is to pursue a course which would defeat the underlying policies of the La Follette-Monroney Act. By and large the purpose of this legislation was to enable Congress to act upon information and mature consideration, rather than upon passion and prejudice. To realize this objective, the act not only limited the unwieldy size and number of committees but also made provisions for staffing them with expert advisers. But before placing this scientific committee machinery to work on the highly technical problem of putting our fiscal house in order, Congress is now acting in a vacuum on a question having tremendous repercussions upon our fate abroad as well as upon our domestic economy.

Mr. Speaker, the section should be suspended and opportunity afforded to substitute a method through which an accurate and dependable budget can be determined and determined in time to affect the appropriations and expenditures of the annual budget. As that is impossible at this time, the only alternative is to adopt the pending resolution and provide time in which to make the best computation possible under the circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion may I revert to remarks on this subject when the adoption of the Reorganization Act was under debate:

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives is the heart and soul of the American system of government. Destroy or nullify its functions and you have left but the shell of free government. Any influence which tends to reduce the confidence or the regard in which it is held by the American people militates to that extent against the effectiveness of the Government, if not the preservation of the Government itself.

Mr. Speaker, wherever dictators and usurpers have climbed to autocratic power in any country, their first care has been to strike at the representatives of the people in the legislative branch of the government. Oliver Cromwell, in proroguing the English Parliament, pointed his sword at the mace lying upon the table of the House of Commons and cried, "Take away this bauble." When it was carried out there went with it representative government in all England.

Again, Napoleon, stalking into the French Chamber of Deputies at the head of his grenadiers, cried, "Follow me. I am destiny. I am the divinity of the day." As his bayonets drove out the representatives of the people, some of them climbing through windows to escape, they drove out civil and religious liberty.

From that day until the end of the Napoleonic dynasty, France, and all Europe controlled by France, was without representative government.

Again, so recently, Hitler, endeavoring to seize the reins of government in Germany, as the first step toward world domination, burned down the Reichstag Building, so that Germany's House of Representatives, unable to meet, was scattered in confusion, and before it could reassemble, a large number had been proscribed or were in concentration camps, and free government in Germany had been destroyed, and free government was in peril throughout the world.

Here in America, whenever any man or group of men has sought to establish autocratic control, whether political, economic, or industrial, they have struck, either directly or by innuendo, at the influence of the Representatives of the American people on this floor. Of course, the American people have long ago advanced beyond the stage of armed interference with the legislative branch of the Government by military authorities. That would be impossible in America today. Our state of civilization does not countenance the political prison or the concentration camp. But there are other ways of undermining the standing and influence of the Congress in the regard and confidence of the people, which, whether with or without sinister motives, can be just as effective when carried to their ultimate conclusion.

The Congress has been subject to criticism—as it should be—ever since the establishment of the Republic. One of the most priceless prerogatives of every American is the right to criticize Congress and the Members of Congress, and that right has been widely and fully exercised from the First Congress down to the Seventy-ninth Congress now in session. At times that criticism has been more virulent and more undeserved than at others. And that is as it should be. Better that Congress and Congressmen be unjustly accused on many occasions than that they should escape merited stricture on any single occasion.

But, Mr. Speaker, in the last 2 years such a flood of unwarranted and unsupported abuse and castigation has been loosed against Congress and its procedure as has no equal in the annals of congressional condemnation.

Newspaper columnists and radio broadcasters have vied with written and spoken jeremiads delivered here on this floor to an extent that at times transcend even the bounds of truth and good taste. The abuse of Congress, criticism of the Congress and its membership and its procedure, has been without precedent since the stormy days of the Sixtieth and Sixty-first Congresses when the House Rules were a national political issue.

Effort has been made to convince the American people that something is so wrong with congressional procedure that dire disaster menaces the country, its form of government, and its democratic institutions, unless immediate and drastic action is taken to save the Nation and its democratic practices from onrushing ruin and destruction. In order to foster this propaganda a campaign of abuse and disparagement of Congress individually and collectively has been waged. Let me quote from just a few of many such castigations. Here is a summarization of such criticism epitomized by one of the distinguished Members of the other body and published in the Pageant magazine:

> The trouble with Congress is, briefly, Congressmen. Their two main interests have been getting reelected and lining their pockets. Short of everything else they are lazy and overpaid. They have it soft. The lobbyists write our laws, and in a way that is fortunate for Congressmen are numbskulls, they are windbags, obstructionists, and worse. Only a vigilant press deters them from raiding the Treasury.

Here is a quotation from a statement made on our own floor:

> The people think we are a bunch of clowns.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Maybe the gentleman who made that statement has heard from his home folks and he does not know about the rest of us.

Mr. CANNON. That is quite possible.

These statements reflect not only on Congress and Congressmen but on the American people. Here is a statement from a national magazine, Life:

> Like the American people, they—

That is the Congressmen—

> Like the American people they represent, they are indeed often ignorant, provincial, and greedy.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. There are good people, honest people, patriotic people, who lack sufficient experience to be able to weigh those statements. Especially is that true when they see those statements in books or pamphlets.

I have received many letters stating, "If the charge is not true, why do you not sue him?" But the gentleman knows how futile and how expensive that sort of procedure is. When a charge is made against the House as a whole, it does occur to me that the makers of the charge should be brought before the bar of the House.

Mr. CANNON. I would hardly favor bringing in the publisher of any magazine or newspaper. As I have said, it is better that Congress be accused untruthfully a hundred times than not to be accused one time when we should be accused.

I think we should demonstrate, as we have demonstrated, and as we are demonstrating, on the floor here, the untruthfulness of these statements.

Mr. Speaker, here is another statement appearing in Reader's Scope:

> Washington's great Capitol dome covers a lot of statemanship and a lot of skulduggery and bungling inefficiency.

Again, here is an editorial appearing in one of the great newspapers of the Nation:

> Congress is unintelligent, lacks courage, is bogged down in red tape.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that there is no distinction here between the Congress and its membership. They do not make that statement with reference to some one or two Members of the House. They make the broad statement that the Congress is unintelligent, lacks courage, and is bogged down in red tape. It is in the deadliest form in which it could be put in order to affect the sentiment of the country. There is no differentiation between the institution and its membership.

Then I include a statement from the Saturday Evening Post, in one of the most astounding articles I have ever read in a national magazine, a number of copies of which have been sent to me from different parts of the United States:

> Congress has been ridiculed by the public and kicked around by the executive departments until a groveling inferiority complex has brought wide conviction to its Members that the future is without hope.

An astonishing statement in a great national magazine, that all hope is gone. These statements have appeared in newspapers and periodicals in every city in the United States, not merely once, but systematically and serially. They are not merely attacks upon the House and its membership, but the idea intended to be conveyed to the people is that a serious situation obtains today which, if not remedied in the immediate future, is fraught with catastrophic disaster.

The impression is given that the situation amounts to a national crisis in which the liberties and the integrity of the Government itself are at stake. As an example, in this article in the Saturday Evening Post the situation is represented as "an issue as grave as any in the history of federalization."

Now that is covering a wide territory but that is the phraseology of the statement. The article goes on to say this supreme and transcendent issue is "whether Congress can modernize its archaic machinery and thoroughly regain its historic position of power without which the democratic process will fail."

It will be noticed that the unmistakable inference is that Congress has lost its powers, and that unless some miracle of recovery can be achieved, democracy is dead, and this in face of the fact that Congress in this session has brushed aside any conflict with other branches of the Government, has maintained its position and power under the Constitution as never before, and has just administered victoriously, without error or scandal, the greatest war in history—a record unapproached in that respect by any Congress since the establishment of the Republic.

Another Member of the coordinate body of the Congress make this statement: "Upon a stronger and more effective Congress may well depend the preservation of democracy in the United States."

You cannot imagine a statement of a more serious tenor.

And another Member of the same body says that something should be done "to see that the American Congress does not wither away."

Another Member of this body says: "Unless the representative system is strengthened, Congress will fade out as an effective control by the people of their Government."

And, again, this: "Situation means a concentration of Government power in one branch of Government. It is a threat to the basic liberties of the people."

And, by another Member of the other body: "We must have a reorganization of Congress to the end that the Congress of the United States may reclaim its lost powers and prestige, and may once again become a truly coordinated branch of the Government."

These Jeremiahs insist that it is not merely a problem; that it is a danger. For example, here is a quotation from the floor:

> Rule by the people must surely end if the Federal Legislature is abolished or reduced to relative unimportance. Both friends and foes of Congress agree that has in a measure already come.

Mr. RANKIN. I wonder how they ever got the idea that the friends of Congress agreed to any such proposition.

Mr. CANNON. I think anybody who is familiar with the actual situation here will appreciate the absurdity of it.

Mr. RANKIN. Of course, the gentleman from Missouri who is now addressing the House knows more about parliamentary law and parliamentary procedure than any other man alive today. I say that advisedly. I knew him when he was a Parliamentarian. I knew him when he first came to Congress. I believe I am as familiar with CANNON'S precedents as any other man in the House. I am sure the gentleman from Missouri will agree that the rules of the House of Representatives as they now stand constitute the greatest system of parliamentary procedure the world has ever known. Am I right in that?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is unfortunate in his premise but he affirms the opinion of every constitutional authority in his estimate of the rules of the House.

Our system of procedure is the product of more than a thousand years of legislative experience. Some objection has been made that it is not up to date, that like a woman's hat or a man's necktie, it ought to change every year. As a matter of fact, parliamentary procedure is based upon fundamental rules of decorum which do not change any more than the fundamental rules of human conduct as set forth in the Ten Commandments change. It has been built up through centuries of experience in various legislative bodies, beginning with the Anglo-Saxon Witenagemot, continuing down through the development of parliamentary government in the colonial legislatures in this country and under our own system of government for more than 150 years.

The tenor of these statements is that the Government faces a crisis. That the threat is serious, the danger is real, the life of representative government is at stake. I ask you seriously, if there is any basis for these statements so industriously disseminated over the country.

Continuing, here is an editorial from one of the great newspapers of the Nation, a newspaper which probably ranks as 1 of the 10 great papers on the American Continent. This is what it says, referring to the situation supposed to have brought about the appointment of the streamlining committee:

> The crisis is a challenge to do something before it is too late. It is an alarming situation.

"Do something before it is too late." Too late for what? "An alarming situation." What is it that is so alarming?

This Congress has been tried as no other Congress has been tried. It has had to meet situations no other Congress has been called upon to meet and it has met them effectively and successfully. Still they say that the situation is so alarming that before it is too late something must be done or chaos will follow.

Every once in a while a messiah arises to predict the end of the world, but the world keeps on going, and despite these tongues of Thersites, Congress keeps on doing a good job—the best it has ever done—but these prophets of calamity say that something must be done, must be done quickly, must be done before it is too late.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has consumed 30 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I will use another 30 minutes.

Continuing, this statement says:

> Congress has largely abdicated its legislative as well as its supervisory functions and duties.

Gentlemen, anyone visiting the House on any day it is in session would be surprised at that statement. What has Congress abdicated? What right or prerogative has it relinquished? What function has it waived? Wherein has it failed in any duty or responsibility?

I have read some of the testimony adduced before the streamlining committee. The committee invited all Members of the House and Senate and anyone else who had a grievance and felt that something was wrong and ought to be remedied, to appear before them. Much of the testimony adduced before the committee borders on the ridiculous. One of the first Members of the other body who appeared before that committee began his statement with an excoriation of the acoustic properties of the Senate Chamber. It has been claimed here that the liberties of the Republic were at stake, and when he was called in and asked how and why they were at stake, he said he could not be heard when he spoke in the Senate Chamber and something ought to be done about it. Another mentioned in his opening statement that he had received a request from a constituent as to where colored feathers could be sold. He was irked because a constitutent who wanted to dispose of commodities which he was in a position to produce inquired of him where a market could be found. He was advised to stand on his dignity and refuse to answer.

Mr. Speaker, we invite every legitimate criticism. But many of the statements that have been so widely circulated in order to whip up interest over this question, are without any foundation of fact.

For example, the statement has been made on the floor here and copied in most of the metropolitan papers of the country, and one of the great newspapers of the country carried it in a box on its editorial page, day after day, week after week, and month after month, as follows:

> Not since 1893 has the machinery of Congress been overhauled.

Largely on that one statement they based their demand for a change of congressional procedure.

Now, that situation, even if it were true, might not be so serious, because the fundamental rules of procedure in a deliberative body do not change from year to year. There are no fashions in legislative procedure. We do not have to have a new set of rules every spring. But the thing I am calling attention to is that the statement which has been so widely publicized, and upon which most of the objection to our procedure has been founded, is utterly without a basis of fact. It simply is not true.

For example, instead of going back to 1893 for a revision of our procedure, the greatest revision of the rules of the House of Representatives of all time was in the Sixty-second Congress, 1911–12. There are Members still on the floor who participated in that revision. We had just come through a political campaign in which the issue was the rules of the House, and, in particular, the control of the Speaker over the House, and the country had, by its vote at the polls, demanded a change in the rules and curtailment of the power of the Speaker. When the House assembled that was the prior item of business.

Accordingly the revision of 1911–12 was the most drastic in the history of the Congress. Committees were established and discontinued. That is the piece de resistance before us today—as to whether we will have new committees or retain old committees or consolidate committees, or what we are going to do about it. In the revision of 1911–12 many committees were changed. Committees were created and abolished. The control of the Speaker over the House, which had become autocratic, was broken. The Speaker's power of recognition, which had been one of his great prerogatives, was circumscribed by the establishment of the Unanimous Consent Calendar, the Discharge Calendar rule, provision for Calendar Wednesday, and restriction to the minority of the right to offer a motion to recommit.

The House took away from the Speaker those powers which had given him autocratic control over legislation. Reference of bills to committees was standardized by the rigid enforcement of the rule of jurisdiction. Recalcitrant committees and managers of conferences were rendered subject to summary discharge. The Holman rule was permanently incorporated in the rules of the House—a provision which has saved more money than any other one provision in the rules. The right to appoint committees, perhaps the greatest source of his power, was taken from the Speaker. Previously he could put a man on a committee or could take him off. If a man did not do what he was told to do, he was taken off the committee, or was sometimes put on a committee with the understanding that he would take some particular action. That power—a power which had been in effect since the beginning of the Government—was taken from him. The Speaker was made ineligible to membership on the Committee on Rules. I remember when the Committee on Rules consisted of three members: John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania; Speaker Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois; and the gentleman from Mississippi, one of the most distinguished Members of this House of all time, John Sharp Williams. The committee would bring in a rule providing for the consideration of such legislation as they wanted. John Sharp Williams would rise and protest vigorously against the "outrage." Finally, when they wanted a meeting of this committee, John Dalzell would go over to Mr. Williams on the floor and say, "Come on, John, we are going to perpetrate another 'outrage.'" No bill could be brought up unless the Speaker approved it.

All this was changed in 1911–12. For the first time in the history of the House, its rules were completely democratized. It constituted the most important and farthest-reaching revision in the annals of parliamentary government in the United States; numerous other changes have been made in subsequent revisions; and yet the country is told that nothing has been done in the way of revising the rules since 1893. In other words, this statement, which has been used more than anything else to bolster up the claim that our procedure is antiquated, out of date, and inadequate, is based upon a statement that is utterly without foundation.

Among the statements lacking in accuracy but advanced as a reason for revision of House procedure is the statement that bills are referred to committees in consideration of the attitude of the chairman toward the proposed legislation. As you know, the Parliamentarian actually refers the bills by authority granted to the Speaker under the rules of the House. The inference is that the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the man who so enjoys the confidence and affection of this body as to be elected its Presiding Officer, will, if he is opposed to a measure, refer it to the committee where the chairman is hostile to that measure, or if he favors it, will refer it to a committee where the chairman is favorable to the legislation. I have here the book and page on which this charge is set forth.

As a matter of fact, nothing could be further from the facts. Never has the oldest Member of this House ever heard, much less known, it to be so much as intimated that the Speaker was governed by his attitude on a bill in its reference to a committee.

Then I think there is no charge that has been made more frequently, and more inaccurately, in an endeavor to secure public approval of some notion that something is seriously wrong with the procedure of the House than the statement that committees have overlapping and duplicating jurisdiction. As a matter of fact, the jurisdiction of the committees of the House is so definitely established and has been for so many years that the question of the reference of a bill never arises on the floor. There is no overlapping committee jurisdiction in this House.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Is it not a fact that the rules of the House provide that, if any Member has an objection to the reference of a bill, he can make a point of order and bring the matter to the attention of the House and the Speaker and have a ruling by the House itself?

Mr. CANNON. I appreciate the gentleman's suggestion, because I was just proceeding to make the statement the gentleman has made. If a bill should be referred to a committee which does not have jurisdiction, there is every provision for its rereference to the committee properly having jurisdiction. If it is a private bill, as the gentleman very well says, a point of order can be raised by any Member. I ask you, when did you ever hear a point of order raised on the floor against the reference of a bill to a committee? I do not recall that in recent years anybody has ever made a point of order against the reference of a bill. Still they would have the country believe that we have such confusion here and so many committees have jurisdiction of the same subject matter that it interferes with the transaction of the business on the floor of the Congress.

The committees of the House are jealous of their jurisdiction, and if anybody, at any time, by the improper reference of a bill should infringe upon their jurisdiction, that committee would immediately protest. The rules provide that if a public bill is improperly referred there are three methods of rereference to proper jurisdiction.

First. By unanimous consent. A Member may rise on the floor and say, "This bill has been referred to the wrong committee. My committee has jurisdiction. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be rereferred." The fact that you have heard no such request in many years is convincing proof that jurisdiction of the committees is well established and understood and there are no conflicting jurisdictions which would give rise to any dispute between committees as to the reference of any of the thousands of bills which are referred every session.

Second. Rereference may be made on the authorized motion of the committee claiming jurisdiction. If any committee thinks a bill to which it is entitled has been improperly referred, they may come in here and ask for a rereference. Have you heard in recent years of a rereference on the motion of a committee claiming jurisdiction of a bill assigned to another committee?

Third. A rereference may be made on the motion of a committee to which a bill has been erroneously referred. Motions for change of reference are privileged, and yet there has been no contest over jurisdiction of committees on motions or change of reference since I can remember. There can be no more convincing proof of the lack of interference between the jurisdictions or the lack of overlapping jurisdictions between the committees of the House. In other words, the widely publicized charge that there is overlapping jurisdiction is without foundation.

Every facility is given for a change of reference if there has been an improper reference, even on appeal. And the fact that none of these facilities have been invoked in recent years is conclusive evidence that there is no foundation for the charge of overlapping jurisdictions so often reiterated through the columns of the press.

It is seldom that a bill is introduced in the House which does not contain matter falling within the jurisdiction of one committee, other matter within the jurisdiction of a second committee and still other matter under the jurisdiction of a third or fourth or fifth committee. In the same bill may be several provisions each of which comes within the province of as many different committees. However, the rule which always applies, and the rule which is always followed by the Parliamentarian, and the rule which has always been satisfactory to the House, is that the bill goes to the committee which has jurisdiction of the major matter in the bill. No change in rules of jurisdiction that you can suggest will prevent that. That is not a conflict of jurisdiction. It is the way in which the bill was drawn, and no change that you can make in the rules would affect it in the slightest.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. No matter how many committees you set up or how you outline the jurisdiction of the particular committees you set up, the same thing would occur in the future at all times?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly. It could not be avoided by any provision of the rules.

So far as departmental officials coming before several committees on the same subject is concerned, the repetition of evidence before different committees is highly salutary. The members of the committee have an opportunity to review the data submitted by the witness on former appearances and are in better position for cross-examination; the witness goes back to the department with a larger cross section of congressional opinion; and the executive and legislative branches of the Government have been each time a little more closely associated. The more frequently the departments are subjected to congressional inquiry the better—and the more carefully they will watch their step in administration and the greater care they will exercise in the expenditure of public funds.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for another 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, there are other instances of misstatements made in order to inflame the people against Congress and congressional procedure. One such instance, for example, is the statement that 95 percent of the bills passed by Congress are drafted in the departments. We had the testimony of the legislative drafting authorities of the Senate and House on that matter. In the House they testified that 23 percent of the bills introduced, and practically all the major legislation which passed the House, passed through their office. On the Senate side, they testified that 50 percent of the bills enacted passed through their office. Any member of the Committee on Appropriations can testify that no department has ever written any appropriation bill that ever came to the floor. In other words, the country is led to believe that a situation exists here which is completely different from what actually exists and that this situation makes it imperative that the procedures of the House be radically revised.

Here is still another misrepresentation: A Member of the House last week reprinted an editorial in the RECORD from a newspaper in his district which said that because he was a new Member he was not allowed to speak and had no opportunity to express himself on the floor. We all know that the newest Member of the House stands on equal footing with the oldest Member of the House, in that respect.

The Committee on Appropriations, like the rest of the committees of the House, frequently has bills on the floor, and any Member who applies can get all the time he wants. No distinction in recognition for debate is made between Members on the ground of length of service. If this gentleman had applied, he could have talked as frequently and as long as the oldest Members of the House, either in point of age or service, or previous condition of servitude.

Another charge which will not bear the test of accuracy is that the men who serve as chairmen of committees have ex officio the power to report legislation or to kill legislation. On the face of it the charge cannot be sustained. Nothing could be further from the truth. The committee of which I happen to be a member has 45 members and the chairman has 1 vote in the 45 and no more. He cannot report a bill unless a majority of the other 44 members approve and he must report a bill if a majority of the committee directs him to report it no matter how unalterably opposed he may be to the measure. The myth that the chairman of a committee has any more power than any other member of the committee is another fabrication calculated to disturb the people and shake their confidence in the one institution which is the safeguard of their liberties and the guaranty of their right of free government.

In the brief time remaining let me say just a word about the much-mooted question of seniority. It is a matter that is not included in the report but it has been so widely discussed I would like to scatter just a few grains of truth and reason on the subject.

To begin with, the importance of the chairmanships is greatly exaggerated. There may be a little glamour connected with the chairmanships but that is about all. Some chairmen have extra rooms and patronage, but as chairman of one of the House committees I do not have even these modest perquisites. I have no more personal clerks and no more office space than I had before I became chairman, and I pay for all my own stationery.

Furthermore, the rule of seniority does not always obtain in the election of a chairman. The rule of seniority is in that respect neither absolute nor invariable. In my own committee there have been notable instances in which the rule of seniority was disregarded. For example, in the Fifty-eighth Congress, although Henry H. Bingham, of Pennsylvania, was ranking member of the Appropriations Committee, James A. Tawney, of Minnesota, was elected chairman. Again, in the Sixty-seventh Congress, although Charles R. Davis, of Minnesota, was the member of longest service on the committee, Martin B. Madden, of Illinois, was made chairman.

The House, under its system of procedure, may elevate a member from the foot, or from any intervening position, to the chairmanship of a committee—and has done so, the seniority tradition to the contrary notwithstanding.

But, regardless of the effect of its application, why should the rule of seniority be deprecated in the Congress of the United States, when it is followed implicitly in every other major activity and industry in the United States?

In the armed forces, in the Army and the Navy, the rule of seniority obtains and has been followed from the days of Gen. George Washington and Commodore Barry. Here is a quotation from a recent editorial in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat:

Regular Army promotions up to brigadier general are traditionally automatic, predicated on seniority.

It is the rule in the War Department and in the Navy Department, and has been so in all armies and navies for time immemorial.

It is likewise the rule in the labor unions of the Nation. Quoting from the International Teamster:

Members of labor unions rank according to seniority. War veterans are assured they will be given their seniority rights when they return from the service.

The rule of labor seniority has been affirmed in two recent decisions in the Federal courts—one by Judge Lederle, in the Federal Court of the District of Columbia, and the other by Judge Briggle, of Springfield, Ill.

Commenting on the decision of Judge Lederle, the CIO News said:

"A veteran is rehired in accordance with his seniority, and continues to work in accordance with his seniority," the CIO veterans' committee pointed out in interpreting Judge Lederle's ruling. "Seniority under union contract is the controlling factor, and if operations are curtailed the veteran may be laid off in line of seniority just as any other worker."

With reference to the Briggle opinion, Labor, the official organ of the railroad brotherhoods, said:

A returning serviceman should regain his old job rights and seniority plus accumulated seniority for time spent in uniform. Thus, a veteran should have the same seniority standing as though he had never left his job.

The rule of seniority is followed in international relations and the dean of the diplomatic corps is always the ambassador of longest service, irrespective of the size or standing of his country.

In keeping with that long-established precedent, the United Nations organization follows the rule of seniority. In order to be elected to the International Court of the UN, a candidate must secure a majority vote in the 57-nation Assembly and also in the 11-nation Security Council.

Here is the rule:

If more than one citizen from the same country gets a majority, only the eldest can become a member of the Court.

The new Russian Constitution, direct and dynamic in its approach to the administrative problems of the day, recognizes the rule of seniority and under its provisions the first sessions of the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R. are always opened by the oldest deputies of each chamber.

Just today President Truman himself emphatically voiced the importance of long service in Congress.

I quote from an Associated Press dispatch just released:

President Truman said today he believes it is a good general policy for Senators of long service to remain in the Senate rather than take other jobs.

He made this observation at his news conference in response to a question bearing on his recent action in urging Senator MCFARLAND, of Arizona, to remain in the Senate rather than take a Federal judgeship in his State. The questioner wanted to know if the President thinks this is a good general policy.

The President replied affirmatively, asserting that a Senator with lengthy service is invaluable to his State and should remain in the Senate.

In matters spiritual and ecclesiastical, as well as civil and temporal, the rule of seniority is observed, notably in the Holy Roman Catholic Church and the Church of England. In both, recognition and advancement are by seniority.

St. Peter himself admonishes:

Likewise, ye younger, submit yourselves unto the elder. Yea, all of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility, for God resisteth the proud and giveth grace to the humble.

In every department of the economic life of the world—national and international—the rule of seniority obtains, and has obtained for time immemorial. Why should Congress be made the exception to the rule?

Directly associated with the diatribes against seniority is the charge that age and experience accumulated in the service of the House disqualify for further usefulness as a Member of the Congress.

Since when has age become a disqualifying factor in human endeavor and accomplishment? Between the ages of 70 and 83, Commodore Vanderbilt added $10,000,000 to his fortune. Verdi at 85 produced his magnificent Ave Maria, his Stabat Mater, and his Te Deum. What a loss to the world if he had been retired at 80. Oliver Wendell Holmes at 79 wrote his Over the Teacups, and Tennyson at 83 wrote Crossing the Bar. Samuel Gompers was head of organized labor in his seventy-fifth year and John Cardinal Glennon, of St. Louis, was elevated to the cardinalate in his eighty-fourth year. President Roosevelt's war Cabinet was made up of Hull at 72, Jones at 70, Ickes at 70, Knox at 70, and Stimson at 76—the Cabinet that won the greatest war in history—and Henry Ford at 82 came back from retirement to make an incalculable contribution to industry and American victory.

Carried to their ultimate conclusions, these critics of seniority propose, in effect, to demote General MacArthur and put a second lieutenant in command, to retire William Green and substitute a husky young hodcarrier, to superannuate His Holiness Pope Pius XII and elevate a parish priest, to fire Eugene Meyer and install a young police-court reporter, to supersede Speaker RAYBURN and put a young two-termer in the chair. They badger men grown old in honored service in the House, men who have made supreme contributions to the Nation in the most critical period in human history with the taunt: "Yeah, yer gittin old." It is the philosophy of the aborigine; the culture and finesse and good taste of the jungle.

It is a philosophy repudiated by a thousand years of experience in the parliaments of the world. The situation is well summarized in a speech delivered by President Taft before the Ohio Society of Washington:

We are told by Edmund Burke himself that it was by slow degrees and constant discussion that Charles James Fox became the greatest parliamentary debater the world ever saw. Fox entered the British Commons before he was 20 years old. He remained a member of that body until his death.

Had Fox been an American and a Member of our Congress, he would have been fortunate if he had been chosen to and served in 10 Congresses—20 years. Sam Randall was not bred a statesman, but he became one of our great parliamentary leaders by reason of his long service. Had John G. Carlisle been English born, he would have served in the House of Commons, at the least, 50 years. Gladstone was in the Commons 50 years. Had he been an American, it is doubtful if the whim of a single constituency would have allowed him 12 Congresses.

There is a truth as profound as political experience can make it.

It is further expressed by a speech delivered by Speaker Clark on the floor of the House during his speakership:

A man has to learn to be a Representative just as he must learn to be a blacksmith, a carpenter, a farmer, an engineer, a lawyer, or a doctor.

The best rule is for a district to select a man young enough to learn and to grow, with at least fair capacity, industrious, honest, energetic, sober, and courageous, and keep him there so long as he discharges his duties faithfully and well. Such a man will gradually rise to high position and influence in the House.

But the young man must be willing to learn, and grow, and should be content to rise gradually. We can all appreciate his impatience. We have all been through it ourselves, to a greater or lesser degree. After a spirited campaign we were finally elected to Congress—the culmination of a life's ambition. The newspapers of our district and State had daily featured our speeches and activities. An enthusiastic delegation with a brass band saw us off on our train to Washington and our friends freely predicted that we would wake Congress up. In fact we rather encouraged that idea.

I recall a Congressman who came to Washington a few years ago assuring his constituents that when he got here he would start Congress off at 9 o'clock in the morning instead of waiting to meet at noon and wasting half the day. Some years ago I happened to be walking behind a new Congressman and his wife on their way over from the House Office Building to attend his first session and his charming little wife said nervously, "Oh, I do hope they will not call on you the very first day."

So, as we all recall, it is something of a disappointment when we reach Washington not to find a delegation and a brass band at Union Station to welcome us to the National Capital. And by some oversight there is no note from the President asking us to hurry down to the White House before unpacking. Most surprising of all, there is nothing in the morning papers about our arrival on the national scene. And when our committee meets we are not elected chairman. It is then we discover there is some sort of conspiracy by the old fellows who have been hanging around the Capitol for several years to keep a young man down. They refuse to recognize ability. And we immediately perceive that the system is all wrong. Let me assure these ardent young Members we have all been through it. It is an old story. Do not take it too hard.

These "old duffers," like you, have come up the hard way. They have not only been through your experience but they have repeated it many times—the odds against them growing heavier each time as they gradually accumulate from year to year inevitable opposition and antagonism growing out of requests for services they are unable to render and the unreasoning slogan, "It is time for a change." In the average congressional district there are at least a hundred able men who every 2 years covertly appraise their chances of defeating the sitting Congressman. Everyone of them would file in the primary if he thought he had a chance to win. They have many advantages in such a contest. The Congressman is constantly on the rack. He must vote on every controversial question before the Nation. On every roll call he must alienate large numbers of his constituents who disagree with him. He must daily confess his inability to find jobs, to secure discharges, to modify the mail service, to provide appropriations for roads, dams, and Federal buildings in his district. In a thousand ways he must fall short of the expectations of his friends and constitutents in failing to accomplish the impossible and then must so ably serve his district and his country as to be able to overcome this growing handicap at every election. And yet there are those who in the press and over the air and on this floor insist that because he has had the capacity to retain his seat in Congress over all actual and prospective competitors through many elections, he is an incompetent moron and disqualified from presiding over a committee.

Time and experience are necessary to give the Nation effective service in Congress. James R. Mann, of Illinois, universally conceded to be the greatest and most effective Parliamentarian who ever sat in the American Congress, said: "I did not open my mouth for the first 2 years I was a Member of the House." On the other hand, William Murray—"Alfalfa Bill"—of Oklahoma, a man of exceptional native capacity who had served his State as president of its constitutional convention, speaker of its house of representatives, and Governor, convulsed the House with derisive merriment when he attempted to debate a point of order a short time after he came to Congress.

Let our impatient young friends, who are so eager to take over the ship of state, serve an apprenticeship as Webster and Calhoun and Lincoln and Truman and Rayburn did before dismissing all the elder statesmen and heading the old ship out to sea in these critical times. Let them serve for a time as seamen "before the mast" before essaying to push the admiral off the quarterdeck.

Seniority, based upon the capacity of men to demonstrate such a high order of statesmanship as to warrant their return to Congress over growing oposition, election after election, offers the only practical system of priority in House and committee procedure.

Seniority settles harmoniously the problem of priorities without dispute or controversy and without jeopardizing morale. Abolition of the rule would be followed by logrolling, factional fights, and political trading on a grand scale.

And I am reading from a recent book on the subject:

The danger that committee places would go to those who were chosen with specific bills or policies in mind would be real and would be suspected even when it did not exist. The bitter personal feeling engendered by an open contest would complicate party management and there would be a delay in beginning work until personal and sectional quarrels could be smoothed out.

It is difficult to conceive of anything that would have a more disastrous effect on the work of a committee than a continuous potential rivalry between half a dozen members of the committee as to which of them would be made chairman in the next session, or in event of a sooner change. The entire membership of the committee would be immediately divided into factions. There would be such continuous maneuvering for position and such suspicion of every move by any faction, however inconsequential, as to seriously impede the work of the committee and prejudice its conclusions. No chairman, however qualified, could secure maximum results in such an atmosphere.

On the other hand, the present system of seniority has been in effect so long no one gives any particular attention as to who is presiding, or who will preside in the future. The system is understood and respected. Attention is concentrated on the work of the committee. The difference between the seniority system and any alternative system is the difference between order and chaos.

But let us take up the one issue on which all reformers of Congress and all streamliners and renovaters of congressional procedure are agreed—the number of committees. We are told that the foundations of free government, the preservation of democracy, and the maintenance of American institutions rests on the number of committees. According to newspaper and magazine statements, if the number of committees is reduced the Republic is safe; if the number of committees is not reduced all hope is gone.

Now what would be accomplished by the reduction of the number of committees? Would there be less work? No. Would the reduction of the number of committees reduce the number of men required to do the work of the committees? No. The reduction of the number of committees would neither reduce the amount of work nor increase the number of men to do the work. In other words, whether you have 10 committees or a hundred committees, you have the same amount of work and the same number of men to do the work. And you would follow the same system of handling the work.

The only difference would be that instead of doing the work in committees, as at present, it would be done by subcommittees made up of the same men. As soon as you combine the 48 committees of the House into 18 committees, you immediately appoint 48 subcommittees. For example, one of the stock arguments in favor of consolidation of committees is that we have three committees dealing with pensions. They fail to note that each of the three committees deals with an entirely different phase of pensions, deals with a different class of beneficiaries, different periods of service, different statutory enactments. The three do not conflict or overlap in any way. So when you consolidate, instead of having three committees and three chairmen, you have one committee and three subcommittees and three subchairmen. The same would be true of every consolidation of committees in the reform.

Now, if a man does the work why should he not have the credit? A chairman of a subcommittee will have to do identically the work he now does as chairman of a committee. Why should he not have a chairmanship?

A manufacturer who operated his plant successfully during the war was awarded an E, and it was conferred with great ceremony. A scholar who has distinguished himself in his particular field is given a doctor of laws degree. An Army or naval officer serving creditably at his desk here in Washington is awarded a bronze star or a promotion. Why should not a man who has served faithfully and effectively through the years here on this floor have some slight recognition? Why should he not have a chairmanship? Under the proposed change—with only 18 committees—men will come here and serve a lifetime, and though they give the Nation the most distinguished service, will never reach a chairmanship. They will do the same work, their subcommittees will do the same work, but there will be no recognition.

"Oh," they say, "one Member is serving on half a dozen committees. He cannot attend them all." He can at least choose those in whose work he is most interested. If he was on one or two, he would be confined to the work of those committees. As a matter of fact, conflicts between any two committees to which a Member may be assigned can usually be arranged if he requests it. Assignment to a number of committees gives him a wider range of work and usefulness than if he is limited to one or two.

And much is made of the statement that some two or three men from the departments have been called to testify before a number of committees on the same subject matter. The more often they are called to testify the better—the closer the relation between the executive and legislative branches, the better opportunity for the executive to judge the reaction to his testimony and the more searchingly the committee can scrutinize the operations of the bureaus of the Government. The complainers complain because the representatives of the executive branch are called to testify so frequently and then they complain because there is not a closer relation between the two branches of the Government. The time of the representatives of the departments is not so valuable that they cannot come before the congressional committees and subcommittees whenever requested—and the more frequently the better.

So all this hullabaloo about the number of committees is pointless and misleading. Reduction of the number of committees would not affect the situation. The same men would still do the same work and do it no better and no worse. There would be no advantages to offset the disadvantages.

Connected with the question of committee structure is the proposal to make further unnecessary and more expensive additions to committee staffs. In this connection the report reflects on the system which has been in use by the Committee on Appropriations for more than three years. The system has been too often discussed here on the floor to require further justification. Suffice to say it has met every requirement. No information has been requested which it did not supply and its cost of maintenance in comparison with service rendered has been the smallest in the history of congressional investigations. The Drafting Service of the Congress has met every requirement. I have never yet heard of a request for service which they have failed to supply. The Legislative Reference Service of the Congressional Library has likewise supplied every need. If any of these research services has failed in its functions, no one has called it to the attention of the House. I have frequently asked on the floor, and in the committee, when complaint was made of lack of research facility, "What information does the gentleman desire? What does he want investigated?" And in no instance has the complainant ever been able to specify any date desired or any particular subject or agency he wanted investigated or on which needed information could not be obtained. If they happen to need further funds at any time, the Committee on Appropriations will provide them in the future, as in the past, on the authority of the legislative committees having jurisdiction, without the report of a special committee. The recommendation for a stenographic pool and an $8,000 assistant for each Congressman borders on the preposterous.

The recommendation that salaries of Members be increased and privileges of retirement be provided has a somewhat more sinister connotation. We witnessed here yesterday the extrordinary spectacle of a determined effort by members of the streamlining committee to restrict all proposals relative to salaries and retirement annuities of Congressmen to the bill recommended by the streamlining committee—for the frankly announced purpose of baiting and sugarcoating such a bill to the extent that Congressmen would be induced to vote for all committee proposals in order to secure larger pay and retirement privileges for themselves. Surely there must be a dearth of merit in the committee proposals if the committee feel that it is necessary to resort to such questionable means of securing consideration of their recommendations, and the streamlining committee does not encourage a very flattering opinion of the membership of the House in suggesting so broadly that Congressmen can be cajoled into supporting its measures for a remunerary consideration—in order to get an increase in pay.

Perhaps the most extraordinary recommendation by the streamlining committee is that relating to fiscal control:

Recommendation: That by joint action the revenue and appropriations committees of both Houses submit to the Congress within 60 days after each session opens (or by April 15) a concurrent resolution setting over-all Federal receipts and expenditures estimated) for the coming fiscal year. If total expenditures recommended exceed estimated income, Congress should be required by record vote to authorize creation of additional Federal debt in the amount of the excess. All appropriations, excepting those of a permanent nature, interest on the public debt, veterans' pensions and benefits, trust expenditures, and public-debt retirement, would be reduced by a uniform percentage in case total appropriations exceeded the amount of the approved budget figure.

Let us consider the effect of such a recommendation. If observed, it could only mean committing the Congress to a budget in advance of detailed consideration. It would be physically impossible to conduct adequate hearings in the time proposed.

Following the committee's recommendation through, after having voted more or less blindly on a ceiling, there would be lessend interest in affecting reductions in the estimates for the several Federal agencies on the part of the committee and the House. It is difficult to appraise such a proposal in any other light than that of discouraging economies rather than that of contributing to economies.

The provisions of the Budget and Accounting Act are much more practical and effective:

If the estimated receipts for the ensuing fiscal year contained in the budget, on the basis of laws existing at the time the budget is transmitted, plus the estimated amounts in the Treasury at the close of the fiscal year in progress, available for expenditure in the ensuing fiscal year, are less than the estimated expenditures for the ensuing fiscal year contained in the budget, the President in the budget shall make recommendations to Congress for new taxes, loans, or other appropriate action to meet the estimated deficiency.

As to supplemental or deficiency estimates, it further provides:

Whenever such supplemental or deficiency estimates reach an aggregate which, if they had been contained in the budget, would have required the President to make a recommendation under subdivision (a) of section 202, he shall thereupon make such recommendation.

This is the law today. It leaves the door open to reductions determined upon after searching inquiry, and it carries the incentive to so curb appropriations as to avoid the need for new taxes, loans, or other means of avoiding deficit spending.

The tendency of the proposal carried in the report of the streamlining committee would be to lessen the interest of Members of the Congress generally in appropriations other than those particular items in which there was a direct interest.

There is too great a tendency in this direction as it is. Appropriation bills go through too quickly. There is too much reliance on the committee reports and too much dependence on the recommendation of the committee. Under the rules the committee merely reports its recommendations as an agent of the House. The presumption is that these recommendations will be sharply scrutinized and subjected to critical analysis when taken up for consideration on the floor. Every bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations should be carefully reviewed and, if necessary, amended by the House. In the last analysis it is the responsibility of the House and the country profits to the degree that responsibility is exercised. The House works through its committees, but committees may, and do, err at times, and the House should not rely too implicity on its committees' recommendations. The final responsibility is here on this floor. The suggestion of the streamlining committee would not emphasize this responsibility. Under its proposal, Members of Congress could without compunction vote against all tax bills and for all appropriation bills. And it would always be possible under such procedure to include in any appropriation for popular projects, such as flood control, a provision that the amount provided for such purpose be not included in the list when the percentage reduction is applied.

Mr. Speaker, we do not have the time to dwell too long on these questions of technical procedure. They are comparatively inconsequential. The frenzied vituperation of sensationalists to the contrary notwithstanding, the Congress can be depended upon to do its work and do it well—as it has been doing it with particular efficiency during the war sessions.

The important thing is to stop all this byplay and stop alarming the country. If there are minor defects which need adjustment, let us make them—preferably on consideration and recommendation by the committee having jurisdiction—and have the matter over with and stop prejudicing the public against the legislative branch of the Government and against their Representatives in the House and Senate.

It would be unfair to the press and the country not to include here, along with the unbridled criticisms which have been quoted, some of the sane appraisals of the Congress in general, and this Congress in particular.

Here is one by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor:

Anything that brings Congress into disrepute weakens the fabric of American democracy.

Mr. Speaker, nothing in recent years has so disturbed the public and so shaken their confidence in, and their regard for, their Government as this campaign to capitalize on the general lack of knowledge of the minutiae of congressional procedure.

Here is a comment from Fulton Lewis, Jr., one of the most reliable of the commentators of the day:

The Seventy-eighth Congress adjourned sine die last night. It was a good Congress, a very good Congress, probably the best and most courageous Congress that we have known since the days of the last World War, and perhaps for even longer than that. It did more to revive and restore the dignity and integrity and the prestige of the legislative branch of the American Government than any other Congress in many, many decades. We might well give it a salute of a job well done, and we might dub it, in congressional history, the Great Seventy-eighth.

Let me also include a pertinent comment from Labor, one of the prominent labor journals of the Nation:

We shouldn't make radical changes without mature reflection and until we are certain we have a better system. Labor still believes that the best way to streamline Congress is to elect the right kind of men to the House and Senate. They will always find a way to enact desirable legislation.

And here is a considered opinion by one of the outstanding historians of our times, Prof. Charles A. Beard:

After studying the operations of the First Congress of the United States and the operations of the Seventy-sixth Congress, I am convinced that for the absence of corruption and concern with the public good, the present body is of the highest order.

Mr. Speaker, in 1944 the United States Government collected more money, borrowed more money, spent more money, and created a greater deficit than any government in any country has ever collected, borrowed, spent, or owed in human history. It is a world record. And in 1945, Congress rescinded more appropriations, reclaimed more money, and made greater reductions in expenditures than was ever effected by any government before in fiscal history. That likewise is a world record. And in all this accumulation and disbursement of wealth—in amounts beyond the capacity of the finite mind of man to comprehend—there has been less unwarranted expenditure, diversion, and waste in proportion to the amounts involved, and results secured, than ever before since government was established among men.

In all the annals of the past there is no parliamentary body which has borne such heavy responsibilities, administered such vast empires of production and distribution, and discharged its duties so faultlessly as the war Congress of the United States. The American people are to be congratulated on the efficiency and integrity with which their representatives in Congress have successfully met the problems created by a war of extermination with the mightiest war machines modern science and military proficiency could create.

It is a great Congress—and it could not have operated so satisfactorily without a great system of procedure.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the resolution.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 230, nays 142, not voting 61, as follows:

AIR COORDINATING COMMITTEE—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 59)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed with illustrations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information and consideration of the Congress the Report of the Air Coordinating Committee for the calendar year 1948.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 7, 1949.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I ask unanimous consent that that committee may have permission to sit during general debate for the balance of this week while the House is in session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

REORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2361) providing for the reorganization of Government agencies, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON].

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2361, with Mr. HARRIS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under unanimous consent agreement, debate is limited to 2 hours, one-half of which will be under the control of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON] and the other half under the control of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, Members of the House of Representatives, it becomes my duty and responsibility as chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments to present at this time for your consideration H. R. 2361, a bill for the reorganization of Government agencies, and for other purposes. I consider it a high privilege to stand before you in this capacity, first, because of the nature and the composition of the committee of which it is my good fortune to be the chairman. To my mind there is no more hard-working committee in all this Congress. As I think of its membership, with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], our majority leader, a member thereof; with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], the ranking minority member, a member thereof; with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] a member thereof, I say I think it is a high privilege to present the report of such a committee. Your committee has worked long and hard on this bill and has heard many witnesses. We believe we have brought to you a bill calculated to render to the people of this country one of the greatest services this Congress could afford, the reorganization of its Government agencies.

In the last 20 years, our Government has grown from about 350 agencies to over 1,800 bureaus and agencies. The number of employees has increased from five-hundred-and-seventy-thousand-odd to over 2,100,000. Expenses have grown from $3,600,000,000 to more than $42,000,000,000.

We have heard many speakers on the floor of this House during the last few years talk about the vast cost of our Government to the taxpayers of this country. When you gaze at the condition of the executive department, you can appreciate that a realining of its agencies, the cutting down of its personnel, and the streamlining of its business, can and will result in a great saving of millions of dollars to the taxpayers.

This plan of reorganization giving the President of the United States the power to take the initiative in bringing out a reorganization plan is nothing new. This type of reorganization has been tried in the past and has been responsible for some great gains. In bringing this bill to you, we are profiting by the experiences and the trials and errors of former bills. We believe that if this bill is adopted by the Congress and becomes a law it will be one of the greatest steps forward we have promulgated in the history of the Congress.

There is at present no law empowering the President to take the initiative in the reorganization of the executive departments. That authorization expired in 1948. So if we mean business let us get busy and give him the power to give us a reorganization plan in time for it to be considered and acted upon by the time the Congress adjourns. We ought to pass this legislation as speedily as possible.

There are certain provisions in this bill that are not found in other bills. I think the best way to present it to you, since we have had the Reorganization Act of 1945, is to call to your attention some of the differences.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. First of all, I want to thank the gentleman for the nice things he has said about the committee, including me, and to say here and now that I am happy to be on that committee and serving with the gentleman from Illinois.

The gentleman has referred to the fact that if this legislation is adopted we ought to be able to proceed expeditiously with the reorganization of the Government. I agree with the gentleman in that regard. I am wondering if the gentleman would agree with me that with the basic work that has been done by the so-called Hoover Commission, with the enactment of this legislation, and with the fact that the Congress is now Democratic, as is the Chief Executive, this job ought to be accomplished in the next 2 years.

Mr. DAWSON. I think we ought to get reorganization plans submitted to this Congress within a very short time.

Further, I wish to say concerning our committee that there has never at any time been any question of partisan politics raised. Every member of the committee went about the job of attending to the business of the Congress as that job presented itself to him.

I refer now to page 7 of the report, setting out the major differences from the Reorganization Act of 1945. By and large the bill follows the 1945 act which, in turn, was largely based on the 1935 act. The major differences between this legislation and the 1945 legislation are as follows: First, that the legislation here proposed would be permanent, while the 1945 act operated for a limited time. In that connection, I want to refer to the hearings. On page 6 of the hearings there is found an excerpt from the message from the President of the United States to the Congress. That excerpt is as follows:

> First, the reorganization legislation should be permanent rather than temporary. While the work of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government makes such legislation especially timely and essential, the improvement of the organization of the Government is a continuing and never-ending process. Government is a dynamic institution. Its administrative structure cannot be static. As new programs are established and old programs change in character and scope to meet the needs of the Nation, the organization of the executive branch must be adjusted to fit its changing tasks.
> The impracticability of solving many problems of organization by the regular legislative process has been frankly recognized for many years by congressional leaders.

On page 137 of the hearings we have this statement made by Hon. Herbert Hoover, former President of the United States:

> Mr. HOOVER. My opinion is that it ought to be permanent legislation because the executive branch of the Government is a constantly changing body. We need no better proof of that than the growth in the number of agencies from 350 to 1,800. I would expect a constant shift in the focus of government, giving emphasis to first one type of action and then to another, with the development of new phases of such action, all of which must be constantly refitted into the whole pattern of the executive branch.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I am happy to yield to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it the purpose of this bill to create the over-all machinery under which the Hoover report may be worked into the affairs of government?

Mr. DAWSON. You are right. So that that part of the Hoover report—for which we are spending so much money—where the need is shown, may be presented to the Congress by the President. So that the President will have the power to incorporate it into his plan and present it to the Congress.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Without this kind of implementation the Hoover report could not be used?

Mr. DAWSON. It could not be used in the light of the experiences of the past.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I am happy to yield to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. VORYS. Under the saving provisions of the bill on page 9 it is provided that any statute or regulation shall have the same effect as if a reorganization act had not been made except by or under authority of law by the abolition of a function.

My question is this: Could there be any change in the substantive law of the country by the abolition of a function, or by the abolition of a function would it merely mean a change in who might be required to carry out the law? It is not quite clear to me what abolition of a function means. As I understood it, this Reorganization Act is not intended to change the laws, except the organization which might enforce the law. Can the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. I think there is no question but that the act does not permit the President to submit a plan that changes the basic law. But the abolishment of a function means that where two organizations have been discharging the same function, if that function is given to one of the organizations it may be abolished as far as the other organization is concerned.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield.

Mr. VORYS. For instance, if two or three agencies were authorized to make loans, the combining of those functions by the abolishment of the function for a number of the agencies could not repeal the authority to make loans? Am I correct?

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. VORYS. So that we are not changing any substantive law in voting for this?

Mr. LANHAM. Not at all.

Mr. VORYS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DAWSON. I would like to say further on that point of the permanency of the legislation, this bill is supported by the views of the only two people in the world who have had experience on the subject. The present President has had the experience of his past term. The former President had the experience of his term in office. We all know from history that no man was more interested in reorganizing the agencies in the executive department than was the former President of the United States, Mr. Hoover. So on the question of the permanency of the legislation, we have the testimony, in no undecided terms, of the only two men who have had actual experience. It gives the incoming President the opportunity and the power, as he becomes experienced, to suggest to the Congress any legislation combining agencies and bureaus, or for the reorganization of departments, for the good of the country that presents itself to him.

No. 2, reading from page 7 of the report:

> No executive agency is exempted under this bill, while under the 1945 act a number of agencies were exempted. It is felt that exemptions, even of major regulatory commissions, would seriously hinder the reorganization effort. Many of the regulatory commissions have nonregulatory functions which appropriately might be assigned to a different type of agency.

That takes care of what has been one of the great faults in past legislation. The exempting of so many agencies and the inclusion in the bill itself of language which was not capable of clear interpretation prevented the Executive from initiating many reforms that were needed because, in his judgment, if made, it would be the occasion of many lawsuits which might continue through the years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five additional minutes.

On page 7 of the hearings we have this statement in the President's message:

> Second, the new reorganization act should be comprehensive in scope; no agency or function of the executive branch should be exempted from its operation. Such exemptions prevent the President and the Congress from deriving the full benefit of the reorganization-plan procedure, primarily by precluding action on major organizational problems. A seemingly limited exemption may in fact render an entire needed reorganization affecting numerous agencies and functions wholly impractical. The proper protection against the possibility of unwise reorganization lies, not in the statutory exemption from the reorganization-plan procedure, but in the authority of Congress to reject any such plan by simple majority vote of both Houses.

That quotation is taken from the President's message.

On page 135 we have the testimony of Mr. Hoover on the same subject:

> I might add to this statement what I proposed that I have given here, that I strongly support the idea that there should be no exceptions in this legislation. The reasons for that view are that I do not know any method by which the Congress can make a differentiation of executive and quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial functions in these agencies. It might be possible to arrive at such a definition with regard to them, but we have to bear in mind that there are such functions—quasi-judicial and quasi-legislative—in practically every department of the Government. We immediately get into difficulties if we try to make definitions. On the other hand, it would seem to me that Congress has an ample check on any action that would undermine those judicial and legislative functions when the President makes his proposed plans.

So upon that change in the bill you have the testimony without question and without equivocation of the only two men who have had opportunity to try out these reorganization plans.

Continuing with the major differences from the Reorganization Act of 1945, I quote from the report of the committee:

> (3) This bill will permit a type of reorganization not authorized under the 1945 act—the granting to any officer of authority to delegate any of his functions. The main purpose is to make it possible for top officials to delegate routine functions which are vested in them by law in such manner as to prevent delegation.
> (4) The bill omits the provision of the 1945 act relating to quasi-judicial and quasi-legislative functions of independent agencies. The omission of this provision is in line with the recommendation of the President and the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government.
> (6) The bill grants broader authority to create offices made necessary by a reorganization. Under the 1945 act the new offices which could be created were only those of "heads" and "assistant heads" of agencies. The change will permit a plan to provide for the appropriate type of officer in each case.
> (7) The bill differs from the 1945 act with respect to the limitation on the rate of compensation applicable to offices created by a reorganization plan.

This makes no change in salaries but merely enables the President to name salaries in compliance with executive law.

We have had the 1945 act, we have had the 1939 act. The bill under consideration differs from them only in the manner that I have stated here in talking over the matter at this time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to compliment the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Expenditures Committee, on the outstanding presentation he has made of this legislation. In bringing in this H. R. 2361 the members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments are indeed entitled to a great deal of commendation, particularly by reason of the complicated and complex nature of the legislation. It is a subject that should have been presented to the Congress before this session. I hope the Congress will reward this committee and also the taxpayers of the Nation by passing this legislation. I again wish to compliment the chairman of the committee for bringing in this bill.

Mr. DAWSON. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Illinois

[Mr. DAWSON] correctly stated, this bill came out of the committee without any previous political discussion. No one has greater respect for the sincerity and honesty of former President Hoover than have I. Beyond question, in recommending this legislation Mr. Hoover was expressing his own ideas, being sincere and honest. And the same may be said of our present President. They both have assumed that every other President, every President who might succeed Mr. Truman, would have the same degree of sincerity and honesty.

Without in any way being personal, it might be suggested to the House that some day we might get a Wallace with a Wallace Senate or a Wallace House. The results that might then come out of this legislation if left in its present form might not only be surprising but astounding to the people of the country.

There is no question but that a reorganization of the executive department is needed. It may be assumed that the failure of previous Congresses and of the present Congress up to this time to enact legislation similar to this is due—and please note this—either to the lack of ability, the lack of information, or the lack of courage on the part of the Members of Congress. Something has always been lacking, because everyone concedes that there must be a reorganization.

Starting with the premise that to serve the people we must have reorganization, and assuming that the Congress will not act if left to itself, where do we go from there? I am in favor of everything this proposed legislation seeks to do, but I want it done in a constitutional way. I do not want to surrender the powers of the Congress to accomplish something that is vitally needed, unless it is necessary to save our national security. Unless our national security is presently threatened, I cannot support the proposed legislation unless we can preserve the legislative powers of the Congress.

This bill, as previous reorganization acts, provides that the President of the United States may submit a plan to the Congress, that upon the expiration of 60 consecutive legislative days the plan so submitted to the Congress shall become the law of the land unless within the 60 days both Houses of the Congress have vetoed it.

This plan not only ignores the constitutional provision that the legislative power is vested in the Congress, but goes farther than that. It reverses the legislative procedure. This plan provides that the President shall submit, and his ideas and his suggestions become the law of the land unless each House within 60 days overrules, vetoes, if you please, what he sends down here. Now, is there any necessity for that? None at all. But, say the advocates of this bill, the Congress will not act if left to itself. Well, assume that to be true. It is not necessary that we leave the Congress to itself to refuse to act.

When this bill comes before the House under the 5-minute rule an amendment will be proposed which will state—and it follows the language of the bill on page 7, section 6—that the plan submitted by the President must be acted upon by both Houses of Congress within 60 days, and that to become the law of the land it must receive the sanction of the two Houses of Congress.

Is there any reason why, having been elected as the people's representatives, having taken the oath here before the Speaker when we were sworn that we would uphold the provisions of the Constitution, that we should not follow that procedure?

It is quite true that section 3 of article II provides that the President shall annually advise the Congress on the state of the Union and that he may on any occasion recommend to the Congress the measures which he considers necessary or good for the national welfare. But the Constitution also says in the very first sentence of section 1 of article I that the legislative power is vested in the Congress which shall consist of a House of Representatives and a Senate.

Section 7 states in no uncertain terms that no bill shall go to the President until it has received a majority of the votes of the Members of each House.

Now, my colleagues, I ask you: Are we to follow through and perform the duty which our constituents impose upon us, and which is marked out sentence by sentence in the Constitution itself? Or are we to delegate our legislative power to the President reserving to ourselves only the right of veto?

If there were a great national emergency threatening immediately the security of our Nation we might waive the constitutional provisions on the ground of necessity.

Assuming that, in order to preserve our constitutional form of government, we must overcome this waste, this inefficiency, it is not necessary that we do it in an unconstitutional manner.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. Under the provisions of the pending legislation a bare majority of the two Houses could reject within 60 days after receiving the President's proposal any proposal that he might make, but once the proposal is accepted and it becomes law, then it would require a two-thirds majority in both Houses in order to overcome the President's veto.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is true and is just an added reason why we should amend the bill, but do it now. There is not a schoolboy who has ever taken a look at the Constitution, if you ask him the question: "How does a bill become law when a bill is presented to the Congress?" but who would say: "Well, it must pass the House of Representatives, it must have a majority vote in the Senate," would he not? Sure. Then it goes to the President and he may veto it, he may pocket it, and then the procedure of two-thirds follows, and it becomes the law of the land.

I want to go along with this legislation. We need the reorganization. The Congress, as stated before, and I repeat it, has heretofore lacked either the ability, the courage, or the inclination to do the job. It has not been done. I am willing to have the President send down any plan he may wish—and I do not care whether you make any exemptions in this bill of this or that department, or agency. I care nothing about that. I am not so particularly concerned about whether the legislation is limited or permanent. All that I ask is that we do not delegate the power specified in the Constitution as belonging exclusively to the Congress to the Executive or any other grantee.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD].

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], whom I respect highly, has stated that Congress lacks the ability, the courage, or the inclination to do the job of reorganization. While I do not care to endorse that statement, I do say that in 160 years of historical record Congress has failed to take affirmative action for the type of reorganization which all of us, including the gentleman from Michigan, admit is desirable in the executive branch. So notwithstanding any technical assertions that Congress should do the job, the fact remains that Congress has not done the job, and every attempt on the part of Congress to take affirmative action to do a good job, a complete job of reorganization of the executive branch, has miserably failed.

Ex-President Hoover, in appearing before our committee, pointed out the reason for that. He said there are 1,800 agencies in the executive branch, and he pointed out that it is clearly impossible for Congress, with all of its other duties, to go into the highly technical and complicated structure of every department and agency of Government and do the job of reorganization that has been found to be necessary.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. I think it should be pointed out, as distinguished from the present situation, that when Mr. Hoover submitted those recommendations Congress was not of his political faith. Of course, that situation does not prevail now, as far as the Chief Executive and Congress are concerned.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I do not see where that has any bearing on the record of 160 years of the failure of Congress to do a reorganization job, nor do I see where it has anything to do with the size of the job that needs to be done.

We all realize that reorganization plans are desirable. We realize that Congress has not been able to do it by affirmative action. So I consider that it is highly constitutional for the Congress to delegate within certain limits the job of reorganization. We merely say to the President, "Avail yourself of the tremendous value of the 24 task-force reports to the Hoover Commission, and whatever subsequent reports and recommendations the Hoover Commission will make based on those 24 task-force reports. Then, after considering all this material, the procuring of which was endorsed by the Eightieth Congress when we set up the so-called Hoover Commission. The Hoover Commission has been in session now for over 18 months and has spent over $1,000,000, with over 300 of the finest technicians in Government that we could procure, sending up to the Congress plans, not one plan, but several plans." Then, I say we will have a firm base upon which a worth-while reorganization of the executive branch of Government can take place.

When the President sends up a plan the Congress then has 60 days in which to consider the plan. If we find out that there is something bad about the plan we have in title 2 of this bill a highly privileged resolution which can be offered on the floor by any Member of the Congress who is in favor of a resolution to disapprove the plan. Any Member of Congress can arise under high privilege and ask that a vote be taken on a particular plan and provision is made for 1 hour of debate on that question. Any committee that is affected by this plan, let us say that it is a plan with reference to the Department of Agriculture, immediately the Committee on Agriculture is on guard concerning this plan to reorganize the Department of Agriculture. Thus the Committee on Agriculture can consider that plan. It can ask for hearings. The hearings can be had in the Committee on Executive Expenditures. The chairman or any member of the Committee on Agriculture can come before that committee and present its case. Then, if the committee itself refuses to bring forward a resolution of disapproval, any member of the Committee on Agriculture can bring to the floor of the House for the consideration of the House a concurrent resolution of disapproval and the House at that time can hear the arguments pro and con and vote it up or down.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. It is quite true, I assume, as the gentleman said, that any Member of the House can arise and propose the disapproval of a plan submitted. Assuming that the House does disapprove, unless we can get the other body to go along, the proposal still becomes the law of the land, does it not?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. That is true.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. If we pass a bill in this body it has to go to the other body and they have to consider it. If they do not take it up, what can we do? Furthermore, this provision that any Member can call it up as a matter of high privilege within 10 days after the reorganization plan comes up will apply to the other body the same as it applies to the House.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. But the difference is that the reorganization plan still becomes the law of the land without the action of one body while in the case of a bill it must have the approval of both Houses to become law. You gentlemen realize the difference.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I would like to point out, however, that that approval is a majority approval. In the case of a bill which has been vetoed by the President and sent down here, it takes two-thirds vote of the House to override the veto. It seems to me this is a very well-balanced arrangement, that only a majority of each House is necessary to disapprove a plan. I point out to you that if a plan is so highly undesirable, certainly the Congress of the United States can at that time exercise its responsibility and by a majority vote of each House disapprove such a plan. I point to the record. Such a thing did occur six times out of seven in the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman would yield, that particular provision is nothing new in a reorganization bill, and it was in the one which expired in April.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Exactly so. That is the one I just referred to. Seven reorganization plans were sent to the House by the President under the Reorganization Act of 1945, and six of them were disapproved by majority action of both Houses. There is no use bringing up a straw man here and then knocking it over. We have the best bill that has ever been presented to the Congress, so far as reorganization is concerned. It gives the President, for the first time in history, the power to go ahead and use this great mass of information compiled by the Hoover Commission, and bring before the Congress plans for our approval or disapproval. Plans which we cannot originate in the House with all of the business that we have to attend to and with all of the logrolling and pressure from groups which are concerned with every facet of every bureau of the great sprawling bureaucracy of government.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield.

Mr. MORRIS. Assuming that this bill should become law, the Congress could later repeal the law if it decided it should do so, could it not?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Exactly. Any part of this plan which becomes law can be nullified. I point out that in the Reorganization Act of 1932 it gave to President Roosevelt great powers, and that later on, in 1933, such action was taken and a limitation was placed upon his power.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Another outstanding contribution in the progress of the history of this legislation—and I want to congratulate the members of the committee on both sides—is the fact that it is permanent legislation, recognizing that this is a problem not for a matter of a year or 2 or 3 or 4 years, but one that is constantly arising, and in which we, the majority party—I speak for myself—have complete confidence. We may disagree with the President of the United States, but I have complete confidence in whoever may be the President of the United States, recognizing the serious responsibility of that office, that any man in that office would carry on to the highest degree humanly possible in the exercise of his best judgment in the interest of the country. I think it is a marked contribution in the progress of legislation of this kind.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

The Congress has delegated to the President broad authority to reorganize the executive branch of the Government five times in the past 17 years. The bill which we present to you today is the sixth presentation of a reorganization bill within the past 17 years. Under all of these reorganization acts, Congress has delegated to the President power to reorganize, on the grounds of economy and efficiency, the sprawling, complicated structure of Government in the executive departments. We have delegated this authority because we have been forced to come to the conclusion that Congress has neither the time nor the ability for unified action to successfully accomplish a reorganization in the executive branch. This principle of lack of ability to execute a real reorganization has been well established and we are setting no precedent today.

The administration of the laws which Congress has passed has become more complicated and burdensome as bureau after bureau has been established and expanded, and as the personnel of the executive branch has multiplied from a few thousand to nearly 2,000,000 governmental employees.

The reorganization acts which Congress has passed have varied in some degree over the years, but one prime purpose has been contained in each of these acts: That purpose has been to delegate to the President authority to do a job which we in the Congress admit that we cannot do. Congress, however, has been fearful in the delegation of this authority, that such delegation would be abused. The Congress has in the past, also, yielded to its fears, and in some instances has been influenced by the tremendous pressures which have been brought on Congress to exempt certain agencies of Government completely from the President's delegated power to reorganize.

In the 1939 Reorganization Act, we exempted 21 agencies of the executive branch from Presidential reorganization; in the 1945 Reorganization Act, we exempted 11 agencies from reorganization. All students of government recognize that these exemptions have crippled the President and have tied his hands in his effort to set up an economical and efficient structure of Government in the executive departments.

Experts in governmental organization have assured us, after careful and objective analysis that these exemptions have prevented, to a lesser or greater extent, the main purpose of a reorganization act.

The present Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments has had the same experience as previous committees charged with the responsibility of reporting a reorganization act. Witnesses have appeared before our committee from outside the Congress, and from inside the Congress, making pleas for the exemptions of special departments of Government. We have listened to their pleas, and, in some instances, our personal feelings have been sympathetic to their arguments, and to their positions. We have also had before our committee, some very notable witnesses, who have insisted that this time the Congress give to the President the power to reorganize the executive branch of Government and to send to the Congress his plan of reorganization, in order that we may curb the sprawling, overlapping, duplicating bureaus of Government which have grown Topsylike in the executive departments of our Government.

President Truman, in his state of the Union message, and in his special letter to the committee, has requested that we give him complete power to present to the Congress, efficient plans of reorganization, which will bring the economy into our Government functions that public opinion is clamoring for. He has asked that we make no exemptions in the pending bill.

The only living ex-President of the United States, the Honorable Herbert Hoover, has also appeared before our committee, and has asked this committee to report a bill without exemptions. He has testified that it is only in this way that a real reorganization can be accomplished. The testimony of ex-President Herbert Hoover bears additional weight at this time because, as chairman of the so-called Hoover commission, which was instituted during the Eightieth Congress for the express purpose of studying our Government structure and reporting back to the Congress, is now ready to start making its report to the President.

I understand that 24 separate task forces have made their reports to the Hoover commission. The Hoover commission will base their report to the President on these 24 task-forces reports. President Truman will, in turn, no doubt, base the reorganization plans which he will send to Congress on the reports of the Hoover commission. In the establishment of the Hoover commission, Congress acknowledged the weight of public opinion on this pressing problem. Approximately 18 months' time has been consumed and upward of a million dollars spent on objective analyses of the different departments of Government. Following these objective analyses, the task forces have made their reports to the commission. The commission, as you know, is completely bipartisan in its approach to this great problem. If we are to cash in on the value of the most extensive study which has ever been made of our sprawling Federal bureaucracy, now is the time.

The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments has presented to this Congress a good bill—a bill which we believe will give the President the power to proceed in an orderly fashion—prepare the reorganization plans to present to the Congress for approval or disapproval.

Today's bill does not contain the exemption of any executive department or agency of Government. We have, however, recognized the great concern felt by many Members of the Congress in changes in certain very important executive departments. We have, therefore, prepared what we believe is a fair compromise approach between those who want no exemption and those who want exemptions.

We have provided that any plan affecting the National Defense Establishment, which everyone admits needs reorganization, be sent to the Congress in a single reorganization plan. This will enable the Congress to review such a plan without having to consider the merits or demerits of any accompanying reorganization plan. We can then, in the exercise of our judgment, either accept or reject such a plan. This provision, we believe, will meet the fears and the concern which many Members have expressed regarding changes in the status of the Marine Corps or in the civil function of the Army engineers or the Navy air arm or other related matters to our national defense.

We have extended this same separate treatment to three other agencies of the executive branch: The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

In the opinion of the committee, these three great bureaus can be considered to be the vital keystones to our financial and business structure. Upon them rests the economic welfare of our Nation. We, therefore, believe that these three agencies should have separate treatment. Many other agencies of Government are vitally important and there will be many who believe that these should also be considered separately. However, it was the opinion of the committee that the functions of the other agencies were not so widespread nor as important as the three bureaus or agencies named, and it was also believed that in many cases more than one agency could be handled by the Congress in the same reorganization plan.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, the committee has worked diligently and certainly with expedition in bringing this matter to the floor. I think it is obvious to all of us that this is basic legislation and must be enacted if the proposals that we hope will be forthcoming for the reorganization of the Government may be adopted.

Of course, those proposals that have been the subject of study by the Hoover Commission for months and months are the direct result of action taken by the Eightieth Congress in setting up that commission, recognizing that basically a job had to be done.

I assume, of course, that this legislation will be passed and that it will become law in some final form that will be effective.

May I say to my friends on the right side of the aisle and my friends on my side of the aisle that, as these recommendations of the President begin to come up, we are going to find that we have a great responsibility before us. Certainly, to those of you who hold the majority power, the matter is up to you, and may I say the baby is going to be on your doorstep. Certainly those of us who think that we need reorganization badly are going to look to you to meet the issue and the challenge with courage and with wisdom and with fair consideration to the people of the country who pay the bills.

I have asked for this time partciularly because there is one thing that has disturbed me. It has disturbed me ever since these matters of reorganization to be initiated by the executive branch of the Government have been before the Congress. That has to do with the way they may affect the great quasi-judicial and quasi-legislative agencies of the Government. By that I refer to such agencies as the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the Civil Aeronautics Board, the United States Tariff Commission, the Railroad Retirement Board, the Civil Functions of the Army Engineers, and a number of others that could be mentioned. Those agencies are primarily, in my view, the creatures of the Congress of the United States. Theirs is the responsibility to administer in the public welfare legislation enacted by the Congress.

The members of those commissions are appointed for a term. The members of the commissions do not change when the administration changes. Since they are appointed for a term they go on. There is a continuity of their operations. They deal with the very lifeblood of the country; with the economy of the country. If there is, for instance, in the Interstate Commerce Commission a continuity of pattern and determination about the rates involved in transportation then, of course, the people of the country may know and understand from time to time what those operations are to be and what the action ought to be. Certainly, it seems to me that it would be disastrous indeed if we were to bring about a situation under which the quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial functions of this great agency should be brought into the executive branch of the Government in such manner that their operations become political instead of nonpolitical.

Take, for instance, the matter of the Federal Communications Commission. You may say that this is a completely far-fetched proposition, but it could happen. Suppose that the functions of the Federal Communications Commission were transferred to the Department of Commerce; you might have a situation under which radio licenses issued to stations might, on a pure political basis, be changed. People build up great businesses on the issuance of a license. They are to have that license as long as they use it in the public interest. And that is the value and the merit and the function of such a commission. As I say, it would be inconceivable to my mind that any such result would be brought about, but certainly there are some in the country and I am afraid some in the Government who would argue that even the quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial functions of those great agencies should be brought within the realm of the executive branch of the Government and, hence, subjected to political control. In the previous reorganizations that we have considered some of those agencies have been specifically exempted. It is argued, and I can understand with what force, that it is difficult in respect to any agency to distinguish the executive functions from the legislative or judicial functions. I recognize that and certainly I, for one, want to write the kind of basic legislation that will make effective reorganization possible. But the fact that there was concern about what might happen to these agencies under this system by which in effect, unless the provision is amended, legislation is written by the executive branch and one branch of the Congress, not two, there should be some safeguard. So some of these agencies in the past have been exempted. In the act passed in 1945 there were certain exemptions. I think probably it has been pretty well agreed on the advice of Mr. Hoover and others that such exemptions should be kept out of this bill. It is said that no President would think of transferring to the executive branch of the Government these great legislative and judicial functions performed by these agencies. But it has been urged, and I find myself in that school of thought, that the pattern that is provided in this legislation under which the reorganization plans regarding four such independent agencies must come up separately and independent of the plans effecting any other reorganization might well be extended to some of these other agencies.

This does not mean that reorganization plans in respect to those agencies cannot be presented here by the President to be acted upon in whatever manner may be finally prescribed in the House. It simply would require that that plan as it affected one of these great independent agencies should come up here standing on its own bottom. You understand that if this legislation is adopted and a reorganization proposal comes up it might have five or six titles. One of them may be bad; all the rest of them may be good, but you cannot pick the good apples out of the barrel and leave the bad ones; you have got to take the whole barrel or leave the whole barrel.

I cannot see how it really would interfere with the effective functioning of this legislation to extend to some of these other agencies the same protection that is contained in the bill on page 7 in subsection (b).

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. If a situation like the gentleman said should occur, where five different plans are treated within the same reorganization plan, four of them being good and one of them being bad in the judgment of Congress, would it not be possible for the Congress to take affirmative action to nullify that part of the plan later on after the whole plan had been passed or accepted as law? Could not the Congress exercise its responsibility by taking affirmative action as to that particular agency?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Indiana two additional minutes.

Mr. HALLECK. Yes; I may say to the gentleman from California, I suppose if a plan came up here with five titles, that might be done. Of course, it could not be the Interstate Commerce Commission because that is included in the four. But take the case of the Civil Aeronautics Board which regulates air carriers like the Interstate Commerce Commission regulates surface carriers. We could adopt the whole thing, then turn around and start legislation through the mill to reestablish the independence of the Civil Aeronautics Authority. But, may I say to the gentleman from California, it seems to me that that begs the question. First of all, such action would be subject to a Presidential veto. The damage done in the meantime might be irreparable. As I say, I want above everything else to have effective legislation that will work. I would like to be optimistic about what the final results are going to be. We have had this sort of scheme on our books for quite awhile and not a lot has happened. Yet I am still optimistic about it. At the same time, I cannot remove completely from my mind the responsibility that I believe is mine to try to see to it that there is a scintilla of safeguard of the independence for these great quasi-legislative and qausi-judicial agencies. Many of them are bipartisan.

Why is that? Because it is expected that in the administration of the basic law passed by the Congress, in which minority and majority combined, there will be expression of the minority viewpoint, whatever that may be, so far as that particular agency is concerned and to avoid political control. Of course, to transfer it to the executive branch of the Government would entirely do away with the whole concept of these independent agencies as that concept has developed through the years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, the Democratic and Republican members alike, has approached the consideration of this question from a very fine angle. There are only two differences of opinion, one expressed by the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] and the other by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

In relation to the observations made by the gentleman from Indiana, may I refresh the memory of my colleagues of the furor that developed in 1940 when the Civil Aeronautics Authority was put under the Commerce Department, though the board was expressly made independent of the Secretary. It was put in there for budgetary reasons. Instead of having that and a number of other agencies floating around and making up their own budgets, the Bureau of the Budget thought it advisable to put them in with certain other departments, yet maintain an independent status. Some Members of Congress honestly expressed the fear that the independence of the CAA would be taken away, that politics would enter into the matter, that planes would crash on account of lack of safety rules, that the pilots would operate the planes through the skies in a negligent manner. Yet none of that has happened. The independence of the agency still exists. It is in the Department of Commerce for budgetary purposes and mainly for that purpose.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. Of course, in that transfer the Congress had already effected a separation of the administrative functions from the quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial function, and the only part of the operation that was transferred to the Commerce Department was the Office of the Administrator which did include the executive functions.

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes, that is true, but you remember back 8 years ago the fears that were expressed as to the effect, and they have not materialized.

Mr. HALLECK. Will the gentleman indulge me in one further observation?

Mr. McCORMACK. Certainly.

Mr. HALLECK. I have talked to some of the folks who are running that branch of the Government, and they are not quite sure whether the Secretary of Commerce is running it or the Civil Aeronautics Administrator, so I do not know what we finally accomplished as a result of it. Maybe we just put a few more people on, but I am not quarreling with the essential fact the gentleman has stated.

Mr. McCORMACK. Now, we have 1,800 agencies in the Federal Government; most of them executive, one distinctly legislative—the General Accounting Office. Then we have these independent agencies.

Former President Hoover made an able presentation, and both he and President Truman are in agreement in relation to this bill; as a matter of fact, they both felt there should not be any exceptions at all or, rather, even any exceptions in the nature of a separate reorganization plan. President Hoover—and he speaks with the voice of experience—has testified that there are over 30 agencies engaged in lending money and making guaranties and in insurance activities. There are 23 activities engaged in major construction work competing against each other for labor and material. They are scattered over 11 departments of the Government. There are 10 agencies dealing with major transportation questions; that is, not connected with regulatory functions, that are scattered through 8 departments and independent agencies. There is the question of the agencies reporting to the President. He had three lists before him. One list showed 65 such agencies. Another computed 94 such agencies. Another computed them as 101 agencies reporting to the President. As the former President said, "The discrepancy in the lists is a difference of opinion as to how much responsibility the President may have in each case. Most of them exercise some executive function." The gentleman from Indiana presents a very interesting question and I am very glad he did. I have some observations to make which, I think that, as realists and legislators, we cannot escape considering. We must face the realization of what has developed in the growth of so-called administrative law. At the outset of our country we were an agricultural nation. While the framers of the Constitution, as well as the later Congresses amending the Constitution, recognized the necessity of constitutional flexibility to meet changing conditions, particularly in the powers delegated to the Central Government under the general welfare clause, and the power to regulate interstate commerce, it is quite probable that they never contemplated the growth of our country into the great industrial Nation it is today. In order to try and meet the perplexing and trying problems arising from our intense economic system, which is a combination of our industry and agriculture, Congress, through necessity to try and meet the complicated situation, brought into being, which is now highly developed and will undoubtedly increase as necessity demands, a system through the establishment of many agencies, most of them independent, with quasi legislative power, authorizing them to enter into the field of detailed regulatory legislation as well as delegating to them quasi judicial powers to function effectively in carrying out the intent of the Congress, Congress resorted to the device of establishing independent agencies in the executive departments. That is where they are located. The Interstate Commerce Commission was the first instance, but the increase since its establishment has been rapid. The legislation that created them usually consisted of a declaration of the policy of the Congress, the promulgation of broad rules to govern the acts of individuals and corporations in a particular field, and a commission established with the authority to implement and enforce the policies and principles stated by the Congress. The theory is that the Congress did not advocate or even delegate its legislative functions, but it exercised that function of broad, general declarations leaving the application of its policy in a particular instance to an agency of its own creation.

The rules and regulations can only be set aside by an act of Congress or by decisions of the court, if any rule in the latter case goes beyond the authority granted to the agency. Until such action takes place, they have the force of law.

Such agencies have broad quasi-judicial powers in their given fields, with a limited review by the courts. Such agencies were born of the necessity that faced the Congress in meeting the important public questions, the recognition from a practical angle by the Congress of its inability to pass detailed regulatory legislation and also conduct necessary quasi-judicial hearings. That question of necessity arose in accomplishing its legislative purpose and objective.

But these agencies also have functions that are purely executive. In addition, the heads or members of the boards or commissions are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, the same as strictly executive agencies. Their executive functions have increased tremendously. No matter what the intent of the Congress was in their creation, that they were intended as arms of the legislative branch, the very necessities of the operations of these agencies, the ever-growing questions that arise in their field, the large increase in the number of employees as a result thereof, and the many other demands made upon them, have brought about a sharp change in the character of these agencies and their operations and the original intent of the Congress in creating them.

Confining myself to the question of this bill, which is a reorganization bill, we must face the practical situation. There is no reason why these agencies should not be the subject of reorganization consideration. The very growth of their jurisdiction and duties, they being not responsible directly to the people, really makes them a fourth department of the Government. That is what they constitute. That is what it has developed into. We never intended that, but they have really developed into a fourth department of the Government. As they are now constituted, this raises some very serious questions as to whether the Congress should continue to consider them as arms of Congress or parts of the executive branch.

This question is not directly involved in this bill, but the fact does remain that if we exclude them or provide for a separate reorganization in so many agencies, we are not facing the realities of the situation. To provide in the case of every agency that a separate reorganization plan must be submitted by the President would seriously cripple the effectiveness of any reorganization of the executive branch. There are too many such agencies in existence.

I will admit that if I had my way we would not have made the exemptions we did, but this bill is the best bill that has ever been reported out of any committee. The first reorganization bill not so many years ago had 21 exemptions. The next one had 12 or 14 exemptions. In this bill there are no exemptions. We only provide that in the case of three agencies and one department a separate reorganization plan shall be submitted to the Congress.

These independent agencies have developed for all practical purposes into a fourth department of the Government, and the very serious implications arising therefrom cannot be overlooked by you and me as legislators. They cross the lines of the legislative, executive and judicial branches of government. They include all of the jurisdiction of the legislative, executive and judicial branches which were expressly established by the Constitution. Congress, through necessity, created them. We know, as experienced legislators, that Congress cannot, through necessity, successfully reorganize them. The very fact that we are considering this bill and the fact that Congress has in the past enacted into law reorganization bills is a frank admission of the inability of Congress to effectively reorganize the executive branch of the government, not to mention the so-called independent agencies. The many complicated questions involved make that very difficult from a practical angle. I think we have the courage. There is no question about it. But just think of the vast scope of the executive branch of the government and think of these independent agencies and how they are interrelated. That is a very delicate and technical subject which Congress, from a practical angle, finds it difficult to approach. I cannot conceive of any President in reorganizing the independent agencies doing so in a manner which would affect the intent of Congress insofar as quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial functions are concerned, so that such agencies retain either an independent or an autonomous position—either independent as now, or autonomous within some other agency or department. Furthermore, we possess under this bill the right to refuse to approve any reorganization plans submitted to us. The gentleman from Indiana has done a very constructive piece of work in bringing this up. I make these observations for your consideration. Our independent agencies have gone far beyond the intent of Congress. They constitute, in fact, a fourth department of government. We will not reorganize them. This is the only way it can be done, by conferring upon the President the power. That will bring them back under one responsible head at least and not take them further away from the people than either the President or you or me as Members of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RIEHLMAN].

Mr. RIEHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is my intention to vote for this legislation as it was reported from the Committee on Expenditures, of which I am a member. Ever since I have been in Congress reorganization of the executive branch of our Government has been a subject of keen interest to me. With the Reorganization Act of 1939, and again in 1945, there has been no recommendations of magnitude which would lend toward more efficient and economical operation of the executive branch of our Government. As at the present time, there is a tremendous overlapping and duplication of the functions of many of the agencies and bureaus of our Government, I cite just a few: Lending Government funds, 29 agencies; acquisition on land, 24; wildlife preservation, 16; welfare matters, 28; gathering statistics, 65. Is there any wonder that there is a lack of efficiency and economy and overall direction with so many agencies dealing with the same subjects? If we are ever going to curtail the unnecessary expansion of our Government, we must start now to consolidate and abolish those bureaus and agencies which are not necessary to the service of our people.

I feel that the President should be given the authority at this time to make whatever recommendations that are necessary for the reorganization of the executive branch of our Government with all agencies and bureaus coming within the scope of this plan. It would, however, exclude the General Accounting Office and the courts of the District of Columbia. I am in wholehearted agreement with the testimony given before our committee by Comptroller General Lindsay Warren. I questioned him as follows:

Mr. Warren, I have been greatly impressed today with the sincerity and the earnestness of your presentation with regard to this legislation. I followed it through carefully and I believe it is your earnest feeling that, if this legislation is enacted, there will be greater efficiency in the departments of our Government, and also there should be a tremendous amount of economy.

Mr. WARREN. I certainly do think that, Mr. RIEHLMAN. I would like to say this—and I weigh my words when I say it: If this fails, then we might as well close up the shop for good regarding hopes of ever reducing the size of this Government or eliminating waste and extravagance and useless functions. I say that very sincerely. I think this is just about the last chance. It is almost the last chance I will have coming up here on it.

Mr. Warren is not alone speaking as Comptroller General but with the background as a Member of Congress for many years.

Mr. Hoover, appearing before the committee, made this remark:

This is a step in the right direction and a step which should and must be taken without delay.

I feel, with this authority granted to the President by the Congress, there should be no reason why he cannot carry out the recommendations set forth in his letter to Congress asking for this authority. Therefore, if proper recommendations are not made, there will be no question as to where the responsibility can be placed.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIAM L. PFEIFFER].

Mr. WILLIAM L. PFEIFFER. Mr. Chairman, at this time I should like to state that I deem it an honor and a privilege to serve on the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments under the chairmanship of that able and distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON].

I am in favor of a reorganization of Government agencies, and I hope this proposed legislation will provide the efficiency and economy that we think it will.

I recognize that there are no exemptions for any agencies in this proposed legislation, but I would be remiss in my duties if I did not point out to the Members of this House that I have received a great many letters and telegrams from my constituents urging that the Corps of Engineers, Department of the Army, be exempt from reorganization under this legislation.

Since George Washington's time the civil functions have been historically performed by this highly trained, nonpolitical branch of the Army, on a nonpartisan and very efficient basis. They have performed with great credit in peacetime the river and harbor work especially where it involves the big multiple-purpose projects, such as navigation, reclamation, power, flood control, and in my district, particularly, bounded by two of the Great Lakes—Erie and Ontario—containing the Niagara River, and many small harbors, they have been of immeasurable assistance to the area. These peacetime duties have contributed greatly to the success of our war efforts in the last two great world wars.

I would hate to see the functions now performed by the corps transferred to some other Federal agency, which may have tremendous political influence by virtue of a Secretary having Cabinet status, and to have these duties performed on the basis of politics rather than of high professional competence.

I hope, however, that the proposed legislation, which provides that a reorganization plan providing for reorganization affecting the National Military Establishment will have to be submitted to Congress in a so-called "one package" plan, will afford this great corps the protection it so richly deserves.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 seconds to congratulate the gentleman from Massachusetts who just left the well of the House upon the acceptance by the now mapority of the proposition offered by Mr. Hoover so many years ago, and upon their final belated recognition of his great services to our country.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HARVEY].

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in addressing the House is to support this resolution and I do commend it to the House. I think it should pass. I say I support this resolution—I am supporting the principle of the resolution. It was my own experience at the State level to serve in the capacity of attempting to help reorganize the State government. The general assembly made two or three rather futile attempts and finally passed a bill which in effect delegated that authority to the budget committee, of which I happened to be chairman at that time. I know the blood, sweat, and tears that came out of that particular type of effort. I say that this effort which is now before us is certainly a most laudable one because in comparison the need for reorganization at the Federal level is far, far greater than any that might be in existence at the State level.

For the last 20 years we have needed this. There have been a number of attempts made to reorganize the executive, most of which have achieved little general benefit, not only so far as the people are concerned but the efficiency of those who are empowered within the Government itself.

The Congress has not accomplished this very necessary task, and evidently will not. The present plan seems to be the very best hope to do so. While it does not provide the usual approach for the enactment of legislation, in that the President inaugurates the resolution and the Congress either votes it up or down, nevertheless the plan has already been used. There remains some doubt in the minds of Members of the House, particularly those who are constitutional lawyers, as to the constitutionality of this act. Not being an attorney, I am not attempting to pass on it. I do say, however, that the positive approach would seem the most logical one, but in the event that it is not adopted, certainly I can say that this approach does provide all the necessary safeguards it would seem to me. For the final power is invested in the representatives of the people.

I want to congratulate the chairman of the committee, who I think has made a very valiant attempt to try to get a good resolution before the House. This has not been an easy task.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARVEY. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. I want to say I am very happy the gentleman from Indiana is a member of this committee because of the long years of experience he has had with this kind of problem. There is no limitation on the number of Government employees who can be employed at any particular time in this bill, is there? There is no provision at all to limit Federal employees?

Mr. HARVEY. That is right.

Mr. JENSEN. Does not the gentleman think that is one of the greatest weaknesses of the bill? Does not the gentleman feel that there should be a limitation placed in this resolution or in some bill which would provide that no more than so many Federal employees could be on the pay roll at any one time? I am afraid that this legislation will permit them to shift employees from one department, agency, or bureau of the Government to another, and we will get no reduction in the administrative personnel cost to the Government.

Mr. HARVEY. I thank the gentleman. And I wish to say that his point is well taken. However, due to his long experience in the field of appropriations, I would suggest to him that primarily the responsibility for reducing Government employees should be resolved in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JENSEN. I think the gentleman is right, except that I think that sort of thing could be placed in this bill. I wish to say to the gentleman that the subcommittee on the Interior Department in the Appropriations Committee, of which I was chairman last year, limited the amount of funds which could be spent by the Bureau of Reclamation to $48,000,000.

Mr. HARVEY. May I congratulate the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HARVEY. I may say that Mr. Lindsay Warren, our present Comptroller General, who testified before our committee and who was a Member of the Congress during the time when the 1939 act was placed on the books, said that it was defeated by the great army of "butters"; that everybody who came and testified before the committee said, "We are for this legislation, but," and then proceeded to ask for the exemption of some particular department. By the time the bill was through the Congress, two-thirds of those affected by the bill had sneaked out from under, so that when you start making exemptions in a bill of this nature you will nullify its benefits.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARVEY. I yield.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Is it not true that it is impossible to write a specific limitation into a bill, in view of the fact that government is not static; it is dynamic and a constantly changing function of service to the people, and by the very fact that Congress itself creates new services and new functions, it would be impossible to prescribe a definite limitation of personnel?

Mr. HARVEY. I might say to the gentleman that it was perhaps best described by the gentleman from Illinois as a fluid condition.

I shall conclude briefly by saying that I feel that the responsibility under this act will be placed directly on the President. I hope he will meet the obligation under the privilege we are giving him with no strings attached to it, and that he will perform this much-needed task for the improvement, efficiency, and economy of our Government.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, in discussing this bill I wish to do so under three headings: First, the necessity for reorganization; second, the plan or method of reorganization; and, third, to touch briefly on the constitutionality of the proposed legislation. Under the latter head I need not take very much of the time of the Committee because I believe it is rather late to be raising the question of the right of Congress to delegate legislative authority. We have been doing it for the past hundred years, and so long as we set up proper standards to guide the person to whom the delegation of authority is made it is constitutional.

I am extending in the RECORD at this point a detailed argument for the constitutionality of this bill.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE REORGANIZATION BILL

Some question was raised at the hearings on H. R. 1569—Eighty-first Congress—as to the constitutionality of turning over to the Executive the legislative function involved in reorganization of the executive branch. The bill proposes authority to transfer, consolidate, or abolish agencies and/or functions of the Federal establishment, the President's orders or plans for such purpose to become effective only after they have lain before Congress in session for 60 days without the adoption by the two Houses of a concurrent resolution of disapproval.

From one point of view there is no delegation at all. That is, as suggested at the hearings, there is merely a reversal of the legislative process, the Executive acting first, and the Congress completing the legislative action by declining to negate the propositions. This is not, however, tenable, because the legislative process requires—Constitution, article I, section 7, clause 2—that both Houses concur separately on each enactment; under the plan of the present bill a reorganization plan will become law notwithstanding one House may vote its outright disapproval.

Rather, it seems more in order to regard the plans as legislation by the Executive, under authority delegated in the present bill, subject, as a safeguard, to veto if both houses disapprove during the 60-day waiting period. Is such delegation authorized?

It is far too late to raise a question whether the legislative function may be delegated. What was sanctioned by over a hundred years of decisions—The Brig Aurora (7 Cr. 382 (1813)), Field v. Clark (143 U. S. 649 (1892)), Intermountain Rate cases (234 U. S. 476 (1914))—of the Supreme Court was not intended to be overturned by the two decisions in the NRA cases 14 years ago—Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan (293, U. S. 388), Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States (295 U. S. 495). The latter gave direction, but did not call a halt. That this, on reflection, is obvious, is demonstrated by the more recent delegations of legislative power now fully sustained on topics and subjects far more essentially legislative in their nature and incidence, for example, devaluation of the dollar, tariff adjustments by reciprocal trade agreements, price fixing by OPA, rent control, as still in effect, and many others—Yakus v. U. S. (321 U. S. 414, 64 S. Ct. 660), Bowles v. Willingham (321 U. S. 503, 64 S. Ct. 641). What was given point by the NRA cases was the requirement that Congress fulfill its function by delineating the policies to be followed, demarking the guides for Executive action, and detailing the standards which the President must follow. It is believed the first five sections of the bill comply with these requirements admirably. They set forth the aims to be sought, the methods to be used, the objectives to be reached to effect the aims, and the limits and restraints which may not be encroached upon. Thus while it has been objected that the bill proposes to abdicate the legislative power of the House to the President and to the Senate—since the joint approval of the latter could effectuate a plan turned down by the House—it seems more correct to say the House is now, by the adoption of this bill, exercising its constitutional function and giving force in advance to whatever plans of the Executive are promulgated under its authority—and, more importantly, pursuant to its provisions—and are not disapproved by the Senate.

Two authorities seem to be so closely in point as themselves to be determinative. While the concurrent resolution veto was called for by the 1939 and 1945 acts, no tests were possible under the former because Congress approved each plan affirmatively by what amounted to a new statute in each case—Fifth United States Code 133s–u–v—and no court cases on the question have been noted under the 1945 act.

But in two cases the constitutional issue was directly raised under the previous but quite similar Reorganization Act of March 3, 1933. It is notable that that act was much broader than the present bill, in that there were no exempt agencies or single-plan method called for. There was less detail in the way of guides and standards, and while the Executive orders were required to lay before Congress for 60 days, there was no provision for a congressional veto other than by the enactment of new legislation. Certain sections of the Government-wide reorganization effected under that law—Executive Order No. 6166 of June 10, 1933—were questioned upon the basis that the delegation of authority was unwarranted under the Constitution. The case came up before a statutory three-judge court, composed of Circuit Judge Chase, District Judge Bondy, and District Judge Robert P. Patterson. The reorganization was fully sustained in the decision of the court, the opinion stating, Congress "elected to have the President investigate and decide what should be done in this regard in the furtherance of efficiency and economy and then adopted his decision. The result was to abolish a board whose existence was dependent upon the will of Congress and to delegate to the Department of Commerce the same powers and duties the board had possessed. This seems in accord with correct standards as to delegation of authority to act within proper limits prescribed by Congress"—Isbrandtsen-Molter Co., Inc. v. United States et al. (14 F. Supp. 407 (1936)).

That opinion was adopted and given full approval by a similar three-judge court in the District of Columbia, composed of Appeals Justice Groner, District Judge Wheat, and District Judge Proctor, in Swayne & Hoyt v. United States (18 F. Supp. 25).

While the two cases were later affirmed in the Supreme Court, the decisions did not turn on this issue because in the meantime Congress had given express sanction to the reorganization by means of later legislation. However, in one subsequent case the Supreme Court referred with apparent approval to the method of reorganization contained in the 1939 act with its provisions, as here, for the plans to become effective unless a concurrent resolution disapprove them—Sibbach v. Wilson & Co. (312 U. S. 1, 15 (1941)).

Also, it is worth while to be noted that the method of reorganization proposed by the present bill to be readopted has been fully approved by the commentators on this subject. See, for example, a symposium on Federal executive reorganization in volume 40, American Political Science Review, at page 1152, and the article entitled "The Legislative Veto and the Reorganization Act of 1939," by Millett and Rogers in volume 1, Public Administration Review, No. 176, 1941. It is suggested also, as a most significant and persuasive authority, that the Congress itself has already fully examined the constitutionality of this identical procedure, and after extended debate has approved and adopted it. See seriatim, the debates in the House and the Senate on the 1945 Reorganization Act.

As to the necessity for the legislation it seems that it is hardly necessary that I say very much. We are all, I believe, agreed that there ought to be reorganization in principle, as somebody said before our committee; and then somebody suggested that we must in this case rise above principle and exempt certain agencies. We all agree in principle that there should be reorganization; the trouble is that every agency of the Government wants to be exempted. Reorganization is needed not only for efficiency and economy but that we may give to the Executive some real power. He has a responsibility to execute the laws of the land, but we have so hedged him about that it is sometimes very difficult for him to do so. I saw the statement credited to him in the newspapers a few days ago to the effect that it had gotten to the point where he had to kiss some of these officials on both cheeks before he could get them to do what was their plain duty; kissing them on one cheek was not enough. I am sure some of you have had the experience that I have, that you almost feel you have got to kiss some other portion of their anatomy to get any consideration. This situation demands correction.

As to the necessity for economy in government, I was struck by what Mr. Hoover said in his testimony. Somebody asked him about taxation and the raising of more revenue for the Government. He said that we had reached the saturation point in taxation; and I am inclined to agree with him. We cannot cut down our appropriations for national defense. We are embarking, or we say we are going to embark, upon a program of additional service to the people which will cost money. There is but one place left, then, where we can economize, and that is in the actual operation of the machinery of our Government, and here is a chance for us to do it not only in principle but actually. How shall it be done? The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] proposes that instead of doing it this way we do it some other way. Everyone agrees that for the past 150 years it has been impossible or impractical for the Congress itself to do this reorganizing job. We have not done it and there is nothing to indicate that we are in any better condition to do it now than we were then. The gentleman from Michigan says that we are overturning our constitutional procedure, and I have great respect for the gentleman's views on the constitutionality of this question.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I have the greatest respect for the gentleman's judgment. Will he tell us why in his opinion the Congress has not done it?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes, I will tell the gentleman why. It is because, as Mr. Lindsay Warren said, of the ganging up process.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I agree with the gentleman and we have been complacent enough to go along.

Mr. LANHAM. That is right. The departments have ganged up on us and we cannot do the job. I do not say the President will do it; however, I think he will try to do the job. He will certainly have no excuse if he does not do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, the primary object of the legislation before the House today is efficiency and economy in government and, goodness only knows, every Member of Congress realizes that that should take place.

There are two things about this legislation that I do not like. The first is that there is no termination date in this bill. It seems to me there ought to be a time limit. There should be 2 or 3 years within which to act and then we ought to stop, because we should not be subject to a President bringing in legislation whenever he wants to, regardless of who the President might be, when he thinks there ought to be a change in government. I have seen Presidents who wanted to change the Government a whole lot when I did not think it ought to be changed. Sometimes they get enough enthusiasm worked up for a particular thing that it goes through and after it is passed we are sorry it happened. Many of you have experienced those changes yourself.

I listened very intently to the testimony of Lindsay Warren, Comptroller General of the United States, in which he made his recommendations. There is no one in Government I hold in higher respect than I do Lindsay Warren. He knows more about the operation of Government, in my opinion, than any living man, at least since I have been a Member of Congress. It is his job to study our Government. He has vision and he makes recommendations as he sees them for the best interest of Government economy and efficiency.

If you will turn to page 37 of the hearings you will see there the examples of overlapping and duplication which occur in Government in the following table:

|---|---|
| Lending Government funds | 29 |
| Insuring deposits and loans | 3 |
| Acquisition of land | 34 |
| Wildlife preservation | 16 |
| Government construction | 10 |
| Credit and finance | 9 |
| Home and community planning | 12 |
| Welfare matters | 28 |
| Forestry matters | 14 |
| Examination of banks | 4 |

When you think of 65 agencies of the Government sending out requests to the business people of this country asking for information, it is no wonder that the business people of the country are sick and tired of making out reports. It is time to stop it.

When we have all of these duplications in Government certainly there is need for consolidation, a need for efficiency. We want to get the operation of our Government down to the point where the affairs of Government are conducted without so much red tape, without so much cost. When you look back to 1932 you will find that it cost $4,600,000,000 annually to run the Government, while today it is costing $41,858,000,000. In other words, in 1932 the per capita cost of running our Government was $37.49, while today the per capita cost has risen to $282.82. The thing has just gone up by leaps and bounds. It is wrong. I tried to stop it but was unable to do so.

Do you know that in 1932, when we had a President who said, "I am going to consolidate the bureaus and eliminate waste in Government" that there were only about 300 agencies of Government, and now we have 1,800 agencies of Government. Why, the thing has grown in leaps and bounds. I will never forget that as long as I live, and I do not want to see it happen again. Then we had Mr. Hoover and his committee, and on that committee there was the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] and the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Mansco, who were helping to make the recommendations that are going to go to the President of the United States. Now we have men of that caliber trying to make recommendations to the President, and he should bring something in here that will simplify Government. Of course, the President does not have to follow out the recommendations made by the Hoover Committee. But, I feel this way: The thing has gone so far we are headed for the rocks, and while this legislation is not the way I want to do it, I am willing to accept it, because I know it is about as good as you can get. If you get something that is about as good as you can get, and you think it is going to try to stop wrongs in Government, you better grab hold of that or else you are going to swamp or drown in Government red tape and confusion, and I am not ready to drown yet. So I will accept this as the best legislation you can get at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BONNER].

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Chairman, it has been an exceedingly fine experience to serve on the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments in the House of Representatives. It has been my good fortune to have had an opportunity to observe the operations of Congress here in the Capitol for 24 years; 16 years of this time from outside, from the gallery, and from around in the corridors as a secretary, and for 8 years or a little better as a Member of the House. I have watched the expansion of the Federal Government. I have watched what we call and what we term the bureaucrats and the "brass" coming in and taking charge, and looking over the tops of their glasses and telling the secretary from your office this, that, or the other, and then when they report and you go down they tell you this, that, or the other. So, why, Mr. Chairman, are they so untouchable? This Congress was created with, and this House and the other branch of the Congress are delegated with, power to carry out the public business. Every 2 years the Membership of this House and every 6 years the Membership in the other body are called on to give an account of their stewardship. The public, the voters if you please, are the check and balance of Congress. But here someone rises up and says, "Oh, you must not touch this agency; you must not touch that agency." They are sort of holy affairs. They are created for a special and a specific purpose. They are delegated to do this, that, or the other. Well, I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that any agency, any private business, any Government, or any other functions should run without a balance wheel and in this legislation we prpose to add the balance wheel to the Government. We propose in this legislation to set forth a form by which they should be audited and checked and made to come in and give an account of themselves, and if they are found superfluous, then to be amalgamated with some other agency so that the machinery can go on in a better fashion and not require so much oiling. In the bill we have under consideration there are only three controversial matters.

Since I have become a member of the committee I have spent quite a bit of time reading the debates on this subject in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD back through the years. I recall the debate in 1939 when this floor was packed and jammed, when the galleries were packed and jammed, and when the corridors were full. The able gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] participated in the debate, which went on for days and days. The former Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], participated in the debate. The present Speaker of the House participated in the debate. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] was a great participator, as was the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX].

It is very noticeable and apparent here today that this question has been debated so much, and every one of the three phases that are in controversy here today have been discussed so much that the seasoned Members of this House and the country as a whole have come to the conclusion that there is nothing further to say about the matter and that further debate is unnecessary; that this Congress should go forward with a program similar to this program, which is the best that can be had, this program which has been thrashed out by the committee, the Members on both sides agreeing to present the matter to the floor of the House, reserving in the legislation that we are passing today a part of the responsibility in reorganizing the Government. The part is that in effecting the law we reserve the right here in the House to say whether it shall be done or shall not be done as proposed by the Chief Executive.

Mr. Chairman, I would not enter into debate with any constitutional lawyer here on the floor of this House, but it has been interesting to me to read about the constitutional question which was debated in 1939, in 1945, and in other years. I think some of the gentlemen on the floor here today participated in those debates. I believe those who participated in the debate in 1939 and those who read that debate will agree that the provision laid down in this proposed legislation, reserving the right in this body to say whether the proposal shall be in effect, is not the constitutional question. The constitutional question is taken care of in the law we propose to pass here today, and it has so been discussed in connection with the act of 1939 and other acts, and evidently by the large favorable vote sustained.

I think it is beyond a question of doubt that with the passage of this bill we will have an opportunity to reject or accept such proposals as will come to the Congress. Whether they are money saving or not is not the question. The question is whether the Government will function better under the proposals as sent down or as the Government is functioning today.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES. Mr. Chairman, the legislation under consideration, according to its sponsors, is to give authority to the President for reorganization of executive agencies, and, further, according to the sponsors of this bill, it is hoped that by reason thereof the executive department may run more efficiently and with more economy.

It is at least interesting to observe that the duplication and multiplication of effort, as well as waste and extravagance, have come about largely through administrative practices, and because agencies that have been created have taken power and authority under themselves that was never intended by Congress. So you are saying today that even though Congress did not intend to provide all of the duplication and multiplication of effort in the Government, it takes an act of Congress to correct it. Independent agencies have, of course, extended and expanded far beyond the intent of Congress.

Those of you who have served in Congress during recent years know that I have put forth a special effort to bring about more efficiency and less extravagance in the Government, and have tried to deal with the question of duplication and multiplication of effort that has spread itself far and wide throughout our agencies.

I submitted to this House on two occasions legislation to deal in a constructive manner with this problem. My legislation would have provided for an arm of Congress that would constantly study the problems we are discussing today and would make recommendations to Congress as to how and wherein the Government could be made to operate more efficiently and economically.

Examples of some of the overlapping and duplication of effort are set forth in the committee hearings in support of this legislation. For example, there are 29 agencies dealing with lending of Government funds. There were 34 agencies during the war dealing with acquisition of land. There are 16 agencies dealing with wildlife preservation, 10 with Government instructions. Home community planning seems to be a popular thing to do. We have 12 agencies dealing with that problem. There are 28 agencies that deal with welfare matters, and 14 agencies with forestry. There are 65 agencies gathering statistics. It is no wonder that people are confused.

I think one of the best authorities on this subject matter, and one who has given the problem a great deal of study, and one who has tried to deal with it realistically and in a practical manner, is our Comptroller General, Mr. Lindsay Warren. Let me quote briefly some of the things he had to say, and you find his statements in the hearings:

> This unsegregated, sprawling crop of Government functions and functionaries cannot hope to operate efficiently or to do well the job the taxpayers are paying for unless someone can assume the burden of putting like functions together, to make only one or two bureaus grow where dozens grew before. What is more, reorganizing is not just reshuffling; it is also abolishing agencies and functions. A tree expected to grow must be carefully pruned, for new branches to have life we must cut off those no longer bearing fruit.

Let me quote further from his statements:

> I reiterate that the present set-up is a hodgepodge and crazy quilt of duplications, overlappings, inefficiencies, and inconsistencies with their attendant extravagance. It is probably an ideal system for the taxeaters, but it is bad for those who have to pay the bill.

Ex-President Hoover has been quoted many times on both sides of the aisle today. It is rather interesting that President Hoover, after 16 or 18 years out of Government, should be called upon to assist in dealing with this question. Of course, I am in favor of legislation that will bring about more economy, more efficiency, and less waste and extravagance in our Government. Whether the enactment of this proposed legislation will do the job is yet to be determined.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES. In just a minute, if I have time. The distinguished gentleman from California who is now on his feet was a member of the House Committee on Civil Service and is presently a member of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. He is one of the active working members of that committee and gives of his time and energy in the study of the problems that come before that committee. He will recall I submitted legislation, the intent and purpose of which was to deal with this problem in a constructive and effective manner. I believe if that proposed legislation had been enacted into law, a great share of the waste, extravagance, and duplication and multiplication of effort to which the majority floor leader has called attention would not have been as big as it is today.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I wish to announce to the Republican Members that the conference which was to be held this afternoon following the session has been postponed until tomorrow morning at 10:30 o'clock.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JENNINGS].

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, this is a far-reaching and an important measure. Far be it from me to intimate that something should not be done about this situation in which we find ourselves. We all seem to be agreed and nobody would dispute the proposition that we do have too many agencies. Many of them are overlapping. Many of them are pyramided, one above the other. There are many duties and functions of government that are duplicated, that are performed by people whose services are not necessary. However, it occurs to me—and I say this with all due deference to the gentlemen who have studied this matter and have spent days in its consideration—that you and I have just been handed this measure upon the spur of the moment. I would like to have had time to read this proposal and the hearings, but this proposal and the hearings were not available until today. It is a reversal of the traditional methods of legislation. Ordinarily, when an end is to be accomplished by the enactment of law, the law is written before it is submitted to the House.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENNINGS. No; not now. I am seeking the light and I am afraid when the blind lead the blind they will both fall into the ditch.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman would not say that applies to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. JENNINGS. Oh, there is nothing personal about this. I am just being impersonal and making an observation which, if my good friend will take to heart and meditate upon it, it may be a salutary thing for him.

Mr. McCORMACK. I always listen to my friend with a great deal of interest.

Mr. JENNINGS. I appreciate the fact you do, and I always listen with interest and profit to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. JENNINGS. I could not refuse to yield to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. My friend probably did not know it, but a copy of the hearings and a copy of the bill now before us, together with the report of the committee, was sent to every Member of the House so that they were received last Saturday.

Mr. JENNINGS. Well, I did not get it. I do not know whether it came to my office or not. I am not angry. I am not laboring under any sense of having been disregarded or neglected. I know that the gentlemen involved are all my friends, but I am just talking about the magnitude of this task and the magnitude of this proposal.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Now my friend will be gracious enough to yield to me, will he not?

Mr. JENNINGS. Yes; I will yield to the distinguished gentleman from California.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I want to yield the gentleman one additional minute to talk on the bill.

Mr. JENNINGS. Perhaps the gentleman from California and I should have a private conversation on this question.

All I am undertaking to say is that it is proposed to delegate to the President these vast powers, yet everybody here knows that the President will not have a thing in the world to do with it; somebody else will work it out. I do not know who will write this proposed reorganization plan affecting all these agencies. I am saying that when a measure is brought in embodying such far-reaching effects that it should spell out, within its pages, exactly what is being provided. I cannot see why this is not done. If you have not had time to write a measure, if you have not had time to abolish agencies, if you have not had time to consolidate their powers or abolish their powers, now is a good time for you to do it and bring in a bill so clear and specific that we will know exactly what we are voting on. We will know exactly who is going to carry out the proposed measure. We all know the President is not going to do this thing personally; he will simply give it his sanction when those to whom he delegates the power we delegate to him have written their report; when they have written the law we alone should write. It looks to me as though this is a delegation of power upon a delegation. You are inaugurating a new system of multiplication, overlapping, duplication, and pyramiding here when you adopt this proposal. You delegate to the President the power to redelegate that power to someone whose identity you do not know and may never know.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, as I am sure many of you know, I am one of the two Members of the House who, under the provisions of H. R. 775, the law which created the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, represent this body on that important Commission. The Commission, just to review for one moment, is a bipartisan commission. It is made up of 12 members, 6 from public life and 6 from private life. Four members were named by the Speaker of the House, one Democrat and one Republican being Members of the House and one Democrat and one Republican being private citizens; four were named by the President pro tempore of the Senate, two from the Senate and two from private life, on a bipartisan basis; four were appointed by the President of the United States, two from the executive branch of the Government and two from private life. The Commission has been meeting for approximately 18 months on a night and day schedule. We have used some 28 task forces in the work of studying the possibilities for helpful reorganization in the executive branch of the Government. These task forces were named on a nonpartisan basis. Some three hundred outstanding citizens of America have contributed their time and their efforts as leaders of these task forces, or as members of the special committees and special commissions that have been set up to study some particular problem of government—some function, some activity, or perhaps, in some cases, some single department or agency of the Government.

I am very happy and very proud to be able to say to the House today that never once in all of the meetings of the Commission, nor in all of the various considerations given to the work of this Commission by the task forces, has there ever been a division along party lines or between the civil members, the private citizens, on the one hand, and the so-called official group on the other. If there has ever been an honest effort made to do a job for the benefit of all the people of America, it has been done by your Commission under the able and splendid leadership of the only living ex-President of the United States. I am also proud to say that the President of the United States, the occupant of the White House at the present time, has aided materially in many, many ways the work of this Commission. The heads of the various departments of government in the executive branch have also cooperated. So I can assure you I approach this legislation entirely from a nonpartisan angle.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that this bill will be enacted into law. I may say, and I have to say this to you in all honesty, that when the question of requesting of Congress the enactment of a reorganization act came before the Commission I had some reticence in my own mind as to just how we should approach the problem, and as to just what sort of reorganization act we should adopt. Yet I became firmly convinced, as we considered the matter, that if we want to accomplish the great purposes for which the Commission was created by the Congress by unanimous vote—and approved by the President promptly—we must give some single authority, to wit, the President of the United States, the power to put most of the Commission's reorganization plans into effect. I was rather concerned about the section of the proposed bill which seemingly sets aside the old well-established constitutional procedure, or at least my understanding of it, whereby it is the legislative branch which legislates, and the President or Chief Executive who acts as the braking power or the controlling power to veto any measure which the Congress may pass, so that Congress must reconsider its position before taking final legislative action.

This provision in this bill, which sets up the requirement whereby each branch of Congress must veto or vote down in any reorganization plan the President may submit, did give me serious concern. Yet I was willing to accept it. Finally I agreed, in the Commission, to accept that section providing we had one other safeguard in the bill. We do have the understanding in the Commission, by the way, that any of us may dissent on any matter, be free to express our own opinion. As I stated, I am willing to accept the section requiring both Houses of Congress to vote down a reorganization plan providing we would have this one safeguard—that there be no permanent authority granted to the President or to his high office to reorganize the Government anytime he wants and in any way he wants.

I am truly sorry that I cannot agree with some of my colleagues on the Commission and with some of my colleagues in the House in support of the provision for a permanent power to be placed in the hands of the President to reorganize the Government. In fact, I think if a time limitation were put on his power to reorganize, if we set a date by which action must be taken, the result will be that the Chief Executive will more rapidly put into effect the recommendations this Commission may make.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman probably knows more about this problem than most anyone in the House. Is this a correct analysis of it: That what we are doing is not delegating legislative power; we are merely giving wider administrative power, including the power to unite and eliminate agencies, and so forth, to make for better administration, and we are merely reserving the right to negative that administrative action by legislation?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. No; I do not want to go that far with the gentleman. Under the Constitution, and under the law, the President of the United States, regardless of what we may do, does have a great deal of power to put into effect a large part of the recommendations and the findings that the Commission will make from time to time to the Congress. But in other instances the President must have this legislative authority and power to make the program comprehensive, and to really do the job of reorganizing. In some instances under the Constitution and statutes already effective we will have to have legislative enactments to accomplish the purpose of the Commission.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JUDD. Is it not a truer statement to say that we are not in this bill delegating reorganizing powers to the President; we are delegating to the President the authority to prepare a plan, as our agent, because he is in a better position than we to prepare a plan of reorganization, which then comes back to us, and we either disapprove it, or, by doing nothing, allow it to become the law and he can then issue orders carrying it out?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I think there is much to what the gentleman says. There is a very fine point involved. We are authorizing the President to make and submit certain reorganization plans subject to our possible disapproval. That is actually what the bill provides.

Mr. JUDD. Not to our disapproval of the actual orders given but to our disapproval of the plan. He cannot issue an order to carry out this reorganization until the 60 days have gone by without adverse action by us.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. That is right.

Mr. JUDD. So that we do not veto a reorganization; we veto a plan which he has prepared as our agent.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. It would be a plan of reorganization.

Mr. JUDD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I do want to say to the House that the great Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, on which I had the honor and pleasure of serving in the last Congress, has, in my opinion, acted wisely and well in bringing this legislation to the floor. Certainly we cannot accomplish the reorganization of the executive branch of the Government, for the purpose of bringing about greater efficiency and economy in its operation, unless reorganization powers, such as contained in the bill, are given to the President. However, there is one dangerous provision in the bill. I can readily accept all other provisions, as I said a moment ago, although I am not too happy about one or two of them. I certainly do not want to see established, as a pattern by which we will be guided in the future in our legislative meditations, either that Congress should act only as an agency to veto actions of the President or that he be given permanent authority to reorganize the Government. Rather than lose the great good that can come from this reorganization, I am willing to accept this bill, if necessary, but I do think we should keep the power in our own hands over the organization of the executive branch of the Government by placing a limit upon the length of time the President can exercise the great power this measure confers. I do not know who may be President 10, 20, or 30 years from now. As much as I respect the President and the Presidency, I would rather always trust the future of the country to the people's representatives in the Congress than to any one individual who may rise to power as President of the United States in the future.

What I say here today is not a reflection on the gentleman who now occupies the White House, as I am sure, from conversations and from the interviews we have had as a commission with him, that he is just as much interested in seeing these reforms go into effect as the Commission which has worked upon them.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. The gentleman is of course making a most valuable statement. I, who have served with him on the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments for the last 2 years, know the valuable service he has rendered on that committee and also on the Hoover Commission, on which he is now serving.

In regard to the limitation of the time, I think the gentleman certainly makes a point there. However, I would ask him if it would not be possible that the Congress by affirmative action at any time could place such a limitation of time upon this program.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Yes; I agree with the gentleman, but that is a dangerous method to pursue, I am afraid, because we can grant a power to the Chief Executive by a simple majority vote of this Congress, but, under our constitutional processes, if a President does not wish to surrender a power, we cannot take that power away from him by legislative action unless we have a two-thirds majority. That is the one great danger I see in the present bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Moreover, we have been assured by the gentleman from Illinois, the distinguished chairman of the committee, that the President could bring about these reorganizations not within 2 years but within a few months, so why extend it indefinitely.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I do not know whether he can do it all in just a relatively few months. I think we have to give him a couple of years, at least, to be fair. However, I do believe that the placing of a time limitation on his authority will act as a spur or a prod to get prompt action—so that there will not be any delay—whereas if the President is given permanent power it may be said, "Oh, there is plenty of time to do that." It is a human failing to put things off, and this governmental reorganization should not be put off. The people of America want action quickly, and I think the President wants action.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. DAWSON. I thank the gentleman for his very, very valuable contribution to this matter. It comes from long experience. We know that his interest in this subject matter is great, and we know of his work with the committee.

I said that we would expect some form of reorganization action upon the different phases as they were presented to us within a few months, but not on the entire reorganization plan, which must necessarily spread over the years.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. May I say in answer to the gentleman that the Commission will file its reports soon. I believe the first report was filed today at noon. That was our schedule. Other reports will be filed every 2 or 3 or 4 days between now and March 13. Of course, the President cannot possibly get all of these matters before him before that time. It will take many months for him to act, but, in my opinion, he should not have permanent power to reorganize, because we want quick action.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CHRISTOPHER].

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote in support of the reorganization bill, H. R. 2361, but I am going to do so with full knowledge of the fact that we are passing on to our President a job that Congress has repeatedly tried to do and failed.

I am supporting the measure because I think the recommendation of the committee ought to be carried out in the interest of economy and better service.

The only thing that gives me concern in the enactment of this bill is the knowledge that no matter what kind of reorganization measure the President may propose he is sure to be condemned by part of the people on the ground that it does not go far enough and by everybody else on the ground that it goes too far. In other words, whatever measures are offered will lead only to criticism.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KARSTEN].

Mr. KARSTEN. Mr. Chairman, for the past 15 years I have been connected with the Executive Expenditures Committee in one capacity or another. During that period I have seen many reorganization proposals, but in my opinion the bill we have before us today is the best reorganization legislation that has ever been presented to the House.

In the strict sense of the word, this bill is not in itself a reorganization bill. Rather, it is the mechanical device with which a reorganization of the executive branch of the Government can be accomplished. The bill sets up a simplified method for revising the organization of the Government through the cooperation of the President and the Congress. The legislation authorizes the President to submit to the Congress plans for reorganizations of agencies and functions of the executive branch. These plans will become effective after 60 days unless they are rejected by a majority vote of the two Houses. In adopting this legislation we reserve to the Congress the right to veto any proposed reorganization plan with which we may not agree. The advantage of this mechanical device is that it enables the President, who has the immediate responsibility for effective administration, to initiate improvement in organization, subject to the review and rejection by Congress. The passage of this bill is the first step that must be taken to bring about any reorganization of the 1,800 offices, bureaus, commissions, administrations, and departments, which make up our Government today.

A year and a half ago the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments reported a resolution to the House providing for the establishment of a Commission To Study the Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government with the view of recommending improvements. This resolution was passed unanimously. The Commission was set up and chose as its Chairman, former President Herbert Hoover. It is composed of two Representatives of the Congress, two Members of the other body, two administrators of the executive branch, and six private citizens. The Commission has made an extensive study of the administration of the Government and within the coming weeks will submit many recommendations for improving the Federal structure. The committee had the privilege of hearing Mr. Hoover and he pointed out that passage of this bill is absolutely necessary if we are to bring about a reorganization of the executive branch of the Government. His testimony made clear that many of the most important recommendations of this Commission can be accomplished only if Congress adopts legislation as provided in this bill.

I believe all of us will agree that keeping the executive branch of the Government in good order is a continuing operation. Reorganization of the Government is not a one-time undertaking. Almost every administration for the past hundred years has urged Federal reorganization but none has brought any major overhaul of the executive agencies.

At the present time agencies of related objectives are scattered all over the Government. There are many Government offices duplicating the same type of work as other agencies. Perhaps not all of such activities can be concentrated in one agency, but we can certainly improve the existing governmental structure.

Practically all of the witnesses who appeared before the Committee felt that this bill should be passed. Of course, we have had the same requests for exemptions that have heretofore been made in connection with legislation of this character. In writing this bill, however, we made no exemptions. The history of this type of legislation shows that where one exemption is made that exemption becomes the basis for others. To make all of the exemptions that would ordinarily be requested in connection with a bill of this kind would destroy its effectiveness. Instead of a bill to facilitate governmental reorganization, we would simply wind up with a bill of exemptions.

In writing this bill, however, we have recognized the desirability of adopting the single reorganization plan method insofar as the National Military Establishment is concerned as well as the major quasi-judicial agencies. The bill does not exempt these agencies from reorganization, but simply provides that any plan for their reorganization must be submitted singly rather than in a general proposal that might affect other Government offices. In this way, Congress will have the opportunity to vote separately on the controversial fields of Federal reorganization.

Suppose, for example, that the Corps of Engineers of the Army is involved in a reorganization plan. That plan can relate only to the National Military Establishment, of which the Engineers is a part. It cannot be tied in with a plan to reorganize some other Government agency. This will certainly assure adequate protection for the so-called controversial agencies.

I do not want to engage in a constitutional discussion, but in my opinion this bill certainly creates no dictatorial powers. In proposing that the President take the initiative and originate plans for the redistribution of executive agencies, Congress reserves a veto power over such plans that he may submit. As you know, the President also has the power of veto. This idea is not a new one. It was first recommended in 1931 by former President Hoover and it has been passed in this House in several reorganization bills since 1939. It is true that the constitutional authority to legislate is vested in the Congress, but this bill does not in any way divest Congress of its legislative prerogative. The bill contains no ban nor limitation on the Congress or its right to legislate. Rather than a limitation, this legislation is an implementation of the legislative prerogative of the Congress.

I hope that the House will adopt this bill and that it will be passed without adding a lot of exemptions. We have the opportunity now to make a major contribution in bringing about greater efficiency in the operation of our governmental offices and departments. It is our responsibility to see that these departments and agencies are as efficient as they can be made, which in turn will be reflected economy and savings to the people we represent.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BLATNIK].

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak in support of this measure, the Reorganization Act of 1949, and to go on record as saying that I am in full accord with its objectives and provisions. The House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments has submitted this bill to the House and recommended its passage only after extensive hearings, careful study, and deliberation, and I am convinced that it offers a workable method of executive-legislative cooperation for making changes in the Federal administrative organization to promote efficiency and economy in Government.

This is a simple bill—it contains no bugs or hidden jokers—its provisions can easily be understood by everyone. The purposes of this bill now under consideration are to reduce expenditures and promote economy in Government—to provide better service to the American people at less cost to the American taxpayer. This end is to be achieved through the regrouping and consolidation of agencies and functions into a more orderly and integrated administrative organization, and in this way eliminate the overlapping of functions and duplication of effort in our Government.

The procedure established by this bill to bring about a reorganization of the administration is simple and workable—it merely provides that the President shall examine the administrative set-up from time to time from the viewpoint of obtaining more efficient and economical execution of Federal policy, and present recommendations for any adjustments in the form of reorganization plans for the consideration of Congress. Such plans shall go into effect after 60 legislative days unless Congress, through concurrent resolution passed by both Houses, rejects said plan. In other words, the President initiates plans for reorganization, and the Congress reviews, ratifies, or rejects such plans. This is a democratic procedure to which there should be no objections.

The need for a general overhauling of our administration has been recognized by every President since Theodore Roosevelt, and by every responsible student of government. Today the Federal administration is a great sprawling labyrinth of agencies—there are over 1,800 of these bureaus, departments, commissions, divisions, administrations, and offices which have accumulated by legislative and executive actions throughout the years. Within this maze of agencies there is considerable overlapping of functions, conflicts of jurisdiction, competition between different agencies, waste, and working at cross-purposes. As a result of this multiplicity and overlap of agencies, there is a great deal of red tape, confusion, and inefficiency.

Now, I am not blaming anyone for this condition. The fact is that our huge administrative mechanism has, as a result of the needs of the people for new services and the demand of two world wars, been built up without plan or design, like the barns, shacks, silos, toolsheds, and garages of an old farm, to become a veritable jungle of unrelated units and services. As a result the President cannot properly execute the laws for which he is held responsible—he is forced to waste his time dealing with some 45 to 80 agencies which report directly to him, and which prevent him from concentrating on the more important duties of his office.

Mr. Chairman, Congress is obligated to take action to remedy this disorganized state of affairs, and the path to follow has been well defined. As the result of research, investigation, and practical experience in business and government, certain well-established principles of organization have developed, and are now generally accepted as the fundamentals of sound public administration. These guiding principles said to be basic in the reorganization of government may be summarized as follows:

First. The functions of government should be grouped into a few orderly departments, with each department being responsible for carrying out all related functions contributing to one major objective;

Second. Each major department should be headed by an administrator appointed by and responsible to the President, thus giving the Chief Executive power to effectively control and direct the administration;

Third. The President should not have more than 20 agency heads reporting to him directly, thus freeing him from the mass of administrative detail, and permitting him to devote his time to major questions of policy;

Fourth. The lines of authority within the departments should be clearly defined and direct from the upper to the lower levels of the administrative hierarchy; and

Fifth. Purely administrative functions should be separated from quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial functions, with the latter being placed under the jurisdiction of autonomous boards and commissions.

These are the standards of sound public administration, and the goals toward which we move in seeking more efficiency in government. This reorganization bill is the first step—the enabling step—toward sound management in our Federal Government. I am sure that its passage will provide better service and more efficient management at less cost to the people of the United States, and I call upon the Congress to enact it into law.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, for a great many years the question of reorganizing the executive agencies of our Government has been a matter of concern, not only to the Congress but to every taxpayer. The subject is not new but the need for reorganization is continually getting more acute.

The number of executive agencies has increased with every Congress and their fields of activity have been expanded.

This situation has brought about many instances of overlapping jurisdictions and duplication of effort which have been accompanied by inefficiency, wastefulness, and ineffectiveness.

Everyone who has any contact with the Federal agencies recognizes the existence of the situation and sees an urgent need for better utilizing the manpower on the Federal pay roll.

The subject has been much discussed but few worthwhile results have been achieved. This is a problem of tremendous magnitude which the Eightieth Congress recognized. Two years ago we passed legislation which resulted in the establishment of the Commission headed by former President Hoover. That Commission has been at work for nearly 2 years making exhaustive studies of our governmental set-up and soon its reports will be submitted to us and to the President with recommendations for remedial action.

The bill before us today will provide a vehicle for the effectuation of recommendations based on the studies of the Hoover Commission. Without this legislation much of the value of the work the Commission has done will be lost.

During the hearings conducted before our committee, many people denounced the existing situation and spoke of "deadwood" in the executive agencies. It is significant, however, that many of the witnesses, while espousing the cause of reorganization, sought exemptions for specific agencies in which they or their constituents were personally interested. This brings into point the need for giving to the President the authority to make recommendations of corrections under legislation which will assure prompt and positive action.

In the testimony it was frequently stated that Congress increases agencies and authorizes additions to the Federal pay roll, but seldom finds it expedient to eliminate an agency or to reduce the number of Federal employees. It is difficult for us who are charged with overall legislative responsibility to visualize specific needs for reorganization and the very nature of the legislative process makes it essential that the President be given a freer hand in revamping the agencies he administers and in eliminating such agencies as are unnecessary, or the functions of such agencies when they are duplicating services performed by other agencies.

In the past we have had similar authority conferred upon the President, but in each instance it has been so circumscribed by exemptions and provisions for special treatment to specific gencies that it has made the problems of the President extremely difficult. In the legislation before us no exemptions are provided and the President will be enabled to recommend reorganization plans in keeping with the needs which are obvious to him and without regard to special interests.

Even so, the legislation provides ample safeguards for the protection of the legislative functions of Congress through the provision by which the Congress can disapprove a plan recommended by the President and thereby make it inoperative. In order to prevent undue delay, the legislation provides for a 60-day period within which the Congress must act if it disapproves of the reorganization plan.

I think it should be pointed out that under this legislation the President can merely transfer agencies or functions of agencies or abolish agencies or functions of agencies. He cannot broaden the authority of any agency beyond that which has already been provided by law. Neither can he establish or abolish completely any executive department whose head has Cabinet status.

We talk efficiency and economy. We all know that it is urgent, especially during this period of international unrest when it is necessary that we make large expenditures in the interest of national security. Our internal economic conditions require maximum efficiency. Let us therefore proceed speedily to pass this legislation in order that the effectiveness of our domestic agencies may be increased, that the expenditures for essential services to our people may be reduced, and that our gigantic governmental activities may be put on a more businesslike basis. I hope this legislation will pass in its present form. I hope that the Members of this body will view the subject from its broadest aspects and will vote for this legislation without seeking to incorporate amendments to give special treatment to pet agencies. If we are in earnest about desiring efficiency and economy in Government, about reducing the Federal pay roll, and making better utilization of the services of Federal employees, we will act speedily to pass this legislation as it has been recommended by the committee.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire to do so may extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Chairman, I speak in favor of the passage of this bill to provide for the reorganization of the Government agencies, and for other purposes.

After a careful reading of the hearings before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, a copy of which hearings is furnished us with a copy of this most important bill, I conclude that Congress itself must recognize that Congress itself is not qualified, because of lack of time, opportunity, and training, to itself enter into the field of reorganization of Government agencies in the executive or administrative branches thereof. This being true, the President of the United States and his associates must have the power.

Evidence shows that for several years Congress has undertaken to pass a reorganization bill from which would flow savings of the taxpayers' money and increased efficiency; but in this bill it appears plainly to me that here is the opportunity for the best piece of legislation in this field yet enacted, or considered.

For instance, it provides no exemptions; it provides no time limit; and there is no limitation either to begin or to end, so that the President has opportunity to come before Congress with his planned reorganization at such time as he is ready to do so. The bill provides that he must examine and reexamine the reorganization of all agencies of Government and must determine what change shall be necessary to accomplish six worthy objectives, which are:

First. To promote the better execution of laws.

Second. To reduce expenditures and promote economies to the fullest extent consistent with operational government.

Third. To increase the efficiency of the operations of government.

Fourth. To group, coordinate, and consolidate agencies and functions of government according to major purposes, as nearly as may be possible.

Fifth. To reduce the number of agencies by consolidating those having similar functions under a single head and to abolish such agencies or functions thereof as may not be necessary for the efficient conduct of government.

Sixth. To eliminate overlapping and duplication of effort.

Mr. Chairman, if we were operating our own private business establishments or if we were in the employ of any of the great successful American corporations, these six objectives would be continuously called to our attention as worthy and essential. And, just because we are employed by the American taxpayers is no reason that these same six objectives should not be continuously before our great Government. Efficiency and operation of major objectives at a minimum of expense is not less essential in government than it is in private business.

The two living men best qualified to tell us their considered opinion have given us their joint opinion on the objectives of this bill—President Herbert Hoover, who happens to be a registered Republican, and President Harry Truman, who happens to be a registered Democrat. These two great Americans have joined forces and have made a recommendation to us as representatives of the people. If experience ever talks, here is where it should talk; and these two great leaders of American executive responsibilities, both past and present, tell us plainly that this bill is the bill which should pass. I am willing to take the strong recommendations of these two men. Their interests have been and are the interests of the American people in these matters.

The bill clearly protects the interests of the American people by providing that the President shall first submit proposed changes to the United States Congress; and, then, the bill gives us, as representatives of the taxpayers, a 60-day period within which to state in writing our objections. This certainly is time enough for us to act and is fair to Congress and does not hold the President up too long.

I shall vote for the bill as the committee has reported it and desires it to be enacted. This is in the interests of the public welfare.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H. R. 2361. It is apparent to me after a careful reading of the testimony of the witnesses who appeared before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments in the interest of this legislation that there is a drastic and immediate need for the passage of this type of reorganization legislation.

I have paid particular attention to the testimony of a fine American and may I add one of the few Americans who has had actual experience and, with the exception of our present President, is best qualified to speak in behalf of this measure. I refer to former President Herbert Hoover. I realize, of course, that Mr. Hoover has presented not only his own views, but, as chairman of the so-called Hoover Commission, he is speaking for all of the outstanding men who comprise that Commission. In addition to his opinion, we have the benefit of the experience of the Comptroller General of the United States, Mr. Lindsay Warren, who has served as a Member of Congress and has spent many years following the subject of this legislation with extreme care. His past position, coupled with the high position he now holds, lends great weight to the force of his testimony.

The constant and steady growth of the Government of this great Nation has produced overlapping and duplication to such an extent that it is not only wasteful from a monetary standpoint but has produced great inefficiency and in many instances we have found Government departments working at odds with one another.

Every Member of Congress should read carefully, not only the testimony of these two important witnesses but the majority report of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. The passage of this bill will and should pave the way for more efficient government and for greater economy.

It is obvious, as we witness the increase in the national budget from year to year, that we must exert every effort to streamline our Government, eliminating waste in the interests of economy and for the benefit of taxpayers.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.,—

TITLE I

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This act may be cited as the "Reorganization Act of 1949."

NEED FOR REORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 2. (a) The President shall examine and from time to time reexamine the organization of all agencies of the Government and shall determine what changes therein are necessary to accomplish the following purposes:

(1) to promote the better execution of the laws, the more effective management of the executive branch of the Government and of its agencies and functions, and the expeditious administration of the public business;

(2) to reduce expenditures and promote economy, to the fullest extent consistent with the efficient operation of the Government;

(3) to increase the efficiency of the operations of the Government to the fullest extent practicable;

(4) to group, coordinate, and consolidate agencies and functions of the Government, as nearly as may be, according to major purposes;

(5) to reduce the number of agencies by consolidating those having similar functions under a single head, and to abolish such agencies or functions thereof as may not be necessary for the efficient conduct of the Government; and

(6) to eliminate overlapping and duplication of effort.

(b) The Congress declares that the public interest demands the carrying out of the purposes specified in subsection (a) and that such purposes may be accomplished in great measure by proceeding under the provisions of this act, and can be accomplished more speedily thereby than by the enactment of specific legislation.

REORGANIZATION PLANS

SEC. 3. Whenever the President, after investigation, finds that—

(1) the transfer of the whole or any part of any agency, or of the whole or any part of the functions thereof, to the jurisdiction and control of any other agency; or

(2) the abolition of all or any part of the functions of any agency; or

(3) the consolidation or coordination of the whole or any part of any agency, or of the whole or any part of the functions thereof, with the whole or any part of any other agency or the functions thereof; or

(4) the consolidation or coordination of any part of any agency or the functions thereof with any other part of the same agency or the functions thereof; or

(5) the authorization of any officer to delegate any of his functions; or

(6) the abolition of the whole or any part of any agency which agency or part does not have, or upon the taking effect of the reorganization plan will not have, any functions, is necessary to accomplish one or more of the purposes of section 2 (a), he shall prepare a reorganization plan for the making of the reorganizations as to which he has made findings and which he includes in the plan, and transmit such plan (bearing an identifying number) to the Congress, together with a declaration that, with respect to each reorganization included in the plan, he has found that such reorganization is necessary to accomplish one or more of the purposes of section 2 (a). The delivery to both Houses shall be on the same day and shall be made to each House while it is in session. The President, in his message transmitting a reorganization plan, shall specify with respect to each abolition of a function included in the plan the statutory authority for the exercise of such function.

OTHER CONTENTS OF PLANS

SEC. 4. Any reorganization plan transmitted by the President under section 3—

(1) shall change, in such cases as he deems necessary, the name of any agency affected by a reorganization, and the title of its head; and shall designate the name of any agency resulting from a reorganization and the title of its head;

(2) may include provisions for the appointment and compensation of the head and one or more other officers of any agency

(including an agency resulting from a consolidation or other type of reorganization) if the President finds, and in his message transmitting the plan declares, that by reason of a reorganization made by the plan such provisions are necessary. The head so provided for may be an individual or may be a commission or board with two or more members. In the case of any such appointment the term of office shall not be fixed at more than four years, the compensation shall not be at a rate in excess of that found by the President to prevail in respect of comparable officers in the executive branch, and, if the appointment is not under the classified civil service, it shall be by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;

(3) shall make provision for the transfer or other disposition of the records, property, and personnel affected by any reorganization;

(4) shall make provision for the transfer of such unexpended balances of appropriations, and of other funds, available for use in connection with any function or agency affected by a reorganization, as he deems necessary by reason of the reorganization for use in connection with the functions affected by the reorganization, or for the use of the agency which shall have such functions after the reorganization plan is effective, but such unexpended balances so transferred shall be used only for the purposes for which such appropriation was originally made;

(5) shall make provision for winding up the affairs of any agency abolished.

LIMITATIONS ON POWERS WITH RESPECT TO REORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 5. (a) No reorganization plan shall provide for, and no reorganization under this act shall have the effect of—

(1) abolishing or transferring an executive department or all the functions thereof, establishing any new executive department, designating any agency as "Department" or its head as "Secretary," or consolidating any two or more executive departments or all the functions thereof; or

(2) continuing any agency beyond the period authorized by law for its existence or beyond the time when it would have terminated if the reorganization had not been made; or

(3) continuing any function beyond the period authorized by law for its exercise, or beyond the time when it would have terminated if the reorganization had not been made; or

(4) authorizing any agency to exercise any function which is not expressly authorized by law at the time the plan is transmitted to the Congress; or

(5) increasing the term of any office beyond that provided by law for such office; or

(6) transferring to or consolidating with any other agency the municipal government of the District of Columbia or all those functions thereof which are subject to this act, or abolishing said government or all said functions.

(b) A reorganization plan providing for a reorganization affecting any agency named below in this subsection may not provide also for a reorganization which does not affect such agency; except that this prohibition shall not apply to the transfer to such agency of the whole or any part of, or the whole or any part of the functions of, any agency not so named. No provision contained in a reorganization plan shall take effect if the reorganization plan is in violation of this subsection. The agencies above referred to in this subsection are as follows: National Military Establishment, Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, Interstate Commerce Commission, and Securities and Exchange Commission.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan: On page 7, after line 20, insert a new section as follows——

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. The gentleman is offering a new section. I have an amendment that I want to offer to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. Do I understand the gentleman from Michigan is offering a new section?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I am offering a new subdivision under section 5, following subsection (b).

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Will the Chair advise me whether or not the offering of the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan adding a new section or paragraph will preclude me from offering my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Not if the gentleman's amendment is otherwise in order.

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan: On page 7, after line 20, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"(c) No reorganization specified in the reorganization plan shall take effect unless the plan is submitted to Congress before January 20, 1953."

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment which would bring about a limitation upon the power; that is, instead of its being permanent legislation it would be limited to January 20, 1953, which would be the date of the expiration of the President's term of office.

I may say that this amendment was drawn by legislative counsel from the Comptroller General's office. This language is word for word, period, comma, and semicolon the same as the previous law. There should be some limitation upon this legislation, although some Members will probably reply that Mr. Hoover said that is not so. It is with a great deal of pleasure that I hear you gentlemen on the Democratic side quoting Mr. Hoover. I wish in previous years, in other campaigns, other elections, along in some October, all down through October and up to election day in November, you gentlemen had quoted Mr. Hoover with a little more appreciation than you did.

Many, many times from the well of the House I have heard members of the party to which the gentlemen who are now quoting Mr. Hoover with approval, who are now citing him as the embodiment of all wisdom and all patriotism, charge that almost everything disagreeable that happened to this country between January of 1928 and the day of the convening of the Eighty-first Congress was due to the mistakes, the lack of wisdom, the unsound policies, of this same Herbert Hoover.

Had Mr. Hoover's reorganization plan been accepted by a Democratic Congress, some of the evils which you seek to cure now might have been ended years ago.

Had his views been given just a little of the consideration which you now claim for them, it might not only have helped some of us on this side, but the country might have been saved billions of dollars, given greater efficiency, and the executive department might have been now operating in an efficient, economical way.

But we are willing to forget your previous criticism of our former President and his views. Many of us are happy, are thankful, to know that, at this late day, you are now recognizing the ability, the straightforwardness, of our great former President, who was so unmercifully pilloried during the years which have elapsed since he left the office.

If some of you now appreciate Mr. Hoover and his service to his country, there should be at least as much rejoicing as there was over the finding of the sheep which was lost and returned to the fold. You know what they said about that fellow who was saved at the last moment. I am glad so many have been converted to at least some of Mr. Hoover's views. Enough of that.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BONNER. The gentleman means Mr. Hoover who appeared before the committee?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BONNER. I am thinking of Mr. Hoover as the Chairman of the Commission. I am not thinking of Mr. Hoover as a political candidate or as a former President. I take it that Mr. Hoover was not expressing entirely his own views with respect to reorganization. I take it he brought to the committee the joint views of the members of the Commission. It was a nonpartisan Commission.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I cannot yield any more.

Mr. BONNER. I just wanted the RECORD to show that.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. My only point is that today so many Members of the House, so many people in this country, have recognized that there is something good in some of Mr. Hoover's views. It is an acknowledgment of a great service which has been too long delayed. That is the only point I was trying to make at this time. Conversion long delayed is a good thing, even if it comes a little late.

If the gentleman knew as much about the workings of this Commission as some other folks he would know that it was not altogether a body of but one mind, and I think Mr. Hoover has from time to time changed his views as the matter went along.

Let us get down to the pending amendment. Some day the gentleman who holds the office of President at the present time will die. He will no longer be President. He may not even be elected to a third term. No one knows who is going to be President in the future, and I want to know what you gentlemen on the other side of the aisle are going to do and where you will be if along comes a President as has a previous President and sends down a reorganization plan which takes over so many of these agencies, for example the USES, and puts it in the Labor Department. The House killed that one twice.

What are you going to do if you should get a President like Mr. Wallace, for example, or some other man, or even the present President who apparently gets his views on labor legislation from the Labor Department, from Phil Murray and from the CIO, and he should send down here a reorganization plan putting the Conciliation Service, the Labor Relations Board, and all of their functions in the Labor Department? What are you going to do if you have a filibuster over in the Senate and a plan like that is not acted on in 60 days? You are going to swallow it lock, stock, and barrel. We ought to think about that.

There should be some limitation on the President's power. There should be an opportunity for the House as well as for the Senate to vote on any plan he sends down here. Both House and Senate should be forced to act. You see where you are getting? You have Phil Murray sitting here on one side, John Gibson of the CIO, and Tobin of the Labor Department sitting on the other side of the President and from that combination down comes a plan, as came down this demand that we repeal the Taft-Hartley Act and go back to the old Wagner Act—a plan which the House does not like, which the House rejects unanimously, but which under this bill may still become the law of the land, either because a majority of the Senate does like it or because of a filibuster which prevents action by the Senate.

Just as sure as you adopt this plan, you some day may have a bill which neither the House nor the Senate would pass becoming the law of the land, rammed down your neck, and you will not like it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment would make the bill in that respect just like all of those that have gone before. Nothing has been done under the other bills so far. We speak of Mr. Hoover with reverence because we believe that from his experience as President of these United States he did learn some very valuable lessons that can serve us in this day. The House must have believed that when he is serving now as chairman of one of the greatest commissions this Congress has ever authorized. I do not believe there is any greater patriot in this country than our former President. We look upon him equally with all other great patriots. But he has something that no other man has; that is experience. He has been the President. He has gone through this. He asked for reorganization in his day. One of his last acts was to request that a reorganization measure might be passed in order to enable his successor to do the things that he never had an opportunity to do.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I did not disturb you, sir. I will not yield at this point.

So, he gave us his experience, and this committee used it. The same way with our present President. We do not question his patriotism. We do not question his love of country. I do not believe that he can be influenced by any outside influence any more than any Member of this House can be influenced by outside influence. Had you been a member of this committee you would know how much influence has been brought to bear upon the members of this committee by various agencies in order to take themselves out of the workings of this bill. But, we are bringing in a bill that we believe is the best that can be had and that we believe will do the job.

If you are going to question the integrity of somebody, then perhaps we ought to start off with a President and a former President. If you are going to agree that they have equal love of country with us, then we ought to use the valuable experience that they have gained, in arriving at a determination which brought this bill about.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield

Mr. DAWSON. I do not yield at this point.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. But you are misquoting him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DAWSON. So, both the present President, whom you are going to charge with this responsibility, and a past President, who has had experience and can talk to us from the viewpoint of experience, ask you to take off that handicap, ask you to make this permanent legislation, ask you to give every President the responsibility of a power to do the thing which you say is necessary to be done and that only a President can do. Sure, you have had this argument in past reorganization plans, and the thing that you did then has been one of the handicaps in bringing about new organization plans.

So, I am going to ask the members of this committee, in the light of past experience, in the light of testimony of these witnesses, in the light of the job to be done for the people of this Nation, that is, setting in motion machinery that can wipe out this overlapping, that can do away with these unnecessary functions, that can streamline the operations of government, even as big business must do today, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] said, to accept the bill as recommended by the committee. Big business has streamlined its own affairs. Gone are the methods of yesterday. No good businessman would stand for his organization to be in the shape that our executive department is in today.

So, I am asking you to stand back of this committee which has given a good deal of thought to this thing, heard witnesses upon it, and have brought you their sober judgment that permanent legislation is necessary in order to do the job.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in the statements made by the chairman of our committee. I agree in a great measure with those statements. However, during the discussion of this legislation I asked that we set a termination date that this legislation might expire on. When I asked Mr. Hoover whether it should not expire in 8 years, he made the statement that he hoped it would not be necessary to continue it that long. I spoke to our committee about the 8 years, and they thought that it was too long. I was under the impression all the time that we were going to have this legislation expire in not over 4 years.

The situation is just this: We have built up this great organization of government for 150 years, and now we are going to try to readjust it. This commission has spent a couple of years getting ready the suggestions upon which the President will act, and under this amendment the President will have 3 years from this time to see that they are consummated. It seems to me it is only wise that a termination date be placed on this legislation, regardless of whether you make it 3, 4, 5, or 6 years. The amendment the gentleman has offered provides, I think, for 3 years. I cannot for the life of me see why it would not be the wise thing to do.

I quite disagree with my chairman on that one point. Otherwise, he has been handling the affairs of this committee in fine shape and has been doing a good job. I admire the way he has handled the committee. I take my hat off to him. But I do think we could put a limitation on the time for which this legislation is to extend and it would be in the best interest of the country. Speaking for myself, I shall vote for this amendment, and I hope the Members of the House will see fit to terminate this power at some time. If you pass this legislation and have no termination date, you will always be in turmoil. You will never know when a reorganization plan might be sent down from the White House, regardless of who the President might be, and at some time it will catch somebody napping and they will not be prepared for it. However, as long as we have the chairman we have now, and as long as we know there is something coming, we will be expecting plans to come in here in the next 2 or 3 years, so that if we are on the anxious seat and are waiting for something, and do not want it to pass, we will take action and see that it does not pass. However, if we let this thing ride along, I can see where damage might happen to this Government that might be irreparable.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MORRIS. Assuming the bill should pass as it is, without the amendment, could not any future Congress or could not this present Congress repeal it if it wanted to?

Mr. RICH. Yes, sure; we have lots of laws. That same thing applies to just what is trying to transpire here now. The Congress can change it, but we will not do it; that is the point. You can get action when you have a termination date or have something to do and you know you are going to do it. If you know you are going to die in 2 weeks from now you will make a will, if you do not have one already; but you say, "Oh, I can make a will any time," and you just let it ride on and on, and then you do not do it. That is the point I am trying to bring out.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this matter I would say is not of tremendous and vital importance. It is a matter of policy. It is a matter which, if decided either way, would not vitally ruin the bill or vitally make the bill. It is a matter of policy which has been decided, on mature consideration, by the members of the committee after having heard testimony before the committee.

In the first place, the President has asked for this power to be made a matter of permanent legislation, and I will get to the points supporting permanent legislation in just a moment.

In the second place, the chairman of our committee asked this question of Mr. Hoover when he was before the committee, and you will find this testimony on page 137 of the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. This bill, Mr. Hoover, is to be permanent legislation? There has been some discussion as to whether or not it should be limited to the term of the President and then a new bill drawn as a new President comes in. Can you give us your opinion on that subject, sir?

Mr. HOOVER. My opinion is that it ought to be permanent legislation because the executive branch of the Government is a constantly changing body. We need no better proof of that than the growth in the number of agencies from 350 to 1,800. I would expect a constant shift in the focus of government giving emphasis to first one type of action and then to another, with the development of new phases of such action, all of which must be constantly refitted into the whole pattern of the executive branch.

This is not just one action of one administration or one President, it is a continuous operation. As long as the Congress has the veto, I do not see that there is any great danger in conferring such a power.

I want to point out to you that in the 1932 Reorganization Act we gave to President Roosevelt a permanent type of legislation. This is an answer to my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], who is my colleague on the committee, when he said that Congress would not do this. In the amended 1933 form, however, the Congress did take away the permanent type of legislation and set a limitation upon the time. That shows that Congress can, has, and could in the future function in regard to the termination of the power. The reorganization of the government is not a one-time undertaking. It is conceived as a continuing problem. Our Government is not a static type of government. It is a constantly growing and changing type of government. Every action which the Congress takes and every law which is passed by the Congress which changes the administrative function or adds to or takes from such functions, creates a different situation in administrative powers. Therefore, there is constantly before the President the need of reorganization. That is why we are asking for permanent legislation. If at any time the President misuses that type of power, we can limit it by legislative enactment. We can speed up his action by bringing before the Congress an act which says that by a certain day he shall take such-and-such an action or the power shall be taken away from him.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield.

Mr. RICH. In the hearings on page 143 I asked Mr. Hoover the following question:

How long do you think it will require the present President or any future Presidents to accomplish everything that should be attained in this legislation?

Mr. Hoover replied:

Well, Mr. RICH, there are two steps here. One of them is to get a definite plan and have it approved by the Congress, or, rather, have the Congress leave it alone; and the other is the taking of a number of individual steps that will each require specific legislation. I take it that we will be in the throes of reorganization even with the utmost cooperation for at least over a year before we will get the machine working and in a position to give us the subsequent benefits. This is no easy task.

Then I asked him this question:

Therefore, it is going to take a lot of time; even 6 or 8 years would not be too long for the Chief Executive to have his organization get things in preparation to make suggestions, would it?

Mr. Hoover said—and this is the point I want to make:

It certainly is quite a period. I hope it is not that long because I would like to live to see the end of it.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Hoover, of course, was referring in that conversation, as I take it, to the Hoover Commission reports, and it is not conceded that the Hoover Commission reports will be the last attempt to reorganize the administrative part of our Government machinery.

Mr. RICH. I have been trying my best to make it clear that what I wanted to know was how long it would take the President to effect this organization.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I know the gentleman does not want the House to think that once action is taken on the present Hoover Commission reports that that will end for all time the necessity for continuing scrutiny of government and continuing reorganization.

Mr. RICH. Oh, no; I would not want to try to fool anybody any place anytime. I want to be straight, open, and aboveboard, and tell them just what I think. If anybody has the idea that I am trying to fool anybody I wish that they would get that out of their mind.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I know the gentleman is not trying to fool anyone, but I just wanted to clarify a point in the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize there is a great deal of good in the Hoover Commission report and a great deal of good in this bill. I recognize the imperative need for reorganization in Government and greater efficiency in Government and for more economies and for the reduction of expenses; but I want to take this time to voice this serious thought with reference to the Army engineers:

This bill goes as far as the committee felt it should go with reference to assisting in the demand which I hear voiced in this Congress regarding the administrative integrity of the Army engineers. This bill separates the program of reorganization so that any plan involving the national defense will come back separately to the Congress and therefore receive a separate vote. However, I feel that the Army engineers have done such a grand job, both in peace and in war, that no reorganization of the Army engineers should occur. I wanted to take just this moment to voice this opinion. I have made a study of the work, as I am sure have a great many other Members of Congress. The Army engineers have done a wonderful job and they are now doing a magnificent job.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield to my chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VINSON. Does not the argument which the gentleman is advancing with reference to the Army engineers apply equally to the Army, the Navy, and the Air Corps?

Mr. BROOKS. In a sense it applies equally; but in another sense I do not think it does apply equally. The Army engineers are in a peculiar position. The Army engineers perform in time of war as a part of our national defense. In time of peace the Army engineers perform as a part of our peacetime set-up. They perform differently from any other agency of Government. That is the reason I felt that I should take this brief opportunity to voice the serious concern which I feel in reference to any effort to change the Army engineers, in the handling of their civil functions as given to them by the Congress.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. As the gentleman may know, there is a provision in the bill, on page 7, which would require that in respect to four named agencies, any reorganization proposal must come up in respect to them apart from and independent of any other proposal. One of those so referred to is the National Military Establishment.

Mr. BROOKS. That is correct.

Mr. HALLECK. It has been represented to me by some members of the Committee on Armed Services that that definition is broad enough to include the civil functions of the Army engineers. I am wondering if the gentleman so interprets it, or the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] so interprets it.

Mr. BROOKS. That is my interpretation. I will say I have discussed the bill with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] and with other Members, and I personally feel it is broad enough to cover the civil functions of the Army engineers. But I cannot fail to feel some serious concern regarding any proposal that would seek to change the set-up by which the Army engineers handle the civil functions of the War Department.

Mr. HALLECK. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. I wonder, for future use in determining the legislative intent, if some members of the committee on the majority side would say whether the language includes the Army engineers.

Mr. BROOKS. I trust the Members, by exercising use of the time they have in the course of debate, will express themselves. I am sorry that time does not permit at this time for them to express themselves. I want to continue to say that I have seen the work of the Army engineers in time of war and I think they must continue to have peacetime work to train them for emergencies. They must have "civil functions work" in time of peace, in order that they be an efficient, hard-working force in our national defense organization in time of war. I hope that no plan of reorganization coming to this body will take any present powers from them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS] has expired.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Louisiana who has just spoken has raised a very important question, and our distinguished former leader, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] has tried to clarify that. I think this is the right time to have an expression from the chairman of the committee, because, if this does not include the civil functions of the Army engineers I am sure the temper of this House is such that we can insert language that will do that. I would like to hear the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs on this proposition.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. VINSON. I suggest to the Committee in the interest of orderly procedure that we dispose of the Hoffman amendment and then later deal with the question that has been raised by the gentleman from Louisiana as well as the gentleman from Ohio. We are beginning to get just a little bit confused. The question raised by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is whether this legislation should be permanent or whether it should terminate in 1953. When we come to the section dealing with the Military Establishment we will have a clear opportunity to debate the question.

Mr. JENKINS. I may say to the gentleman from Georgia that I agree with him that that will be the logical place to discuss this, but, inasmuch as it has been injected into the debate, I think it should be clarified now. What I want is that the Army engineers be not disturbed in the work they do for civil activities of the Government. We all know that the Army engineers are one of the most efficient agencies of the Government, and I am sure that Congress will not do this group any injustice. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will introduce the proper amendment at the proper time.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in relation to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] I hope that the Committee of the Whole will vote the amendment down. There are certain compelling reasons which prompt me to oppose his amendment. Experience has shown as a result of the passage of certain reorganization bills during the past 16 years or so that the fears we have entertained in the past need no longer be entertained by us. Furthermore, the reorganization of the executive branch is a continuing affair. I have no fear about a future President of the United States. I have no fear of a President after 1953; if it is not President Truman I have confidence that the man who will be in the White House will perform his duty in accordance with his trust and to the best of his ability, having in mind the best interests of our country and our people. I might disagree with him, but that is different from impugning his motives.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am not saying that the gentleman does, that is not raised in the gentleman's amendment and I know it does not exist in the gentleman's mind, but I am expressing my thoughts as to why I oppose the amendment. In no way do I want my remarks to be construed by anyone as a thought on my part that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] entertains any opposite view to the one I have expressed in relation to confidence in the present or any future President. But I think we have had the experience that justifies us now in making permanent legislation out of a reorganization bill.

President Truman, in his message to Congress, specifically on two occasions emphasized that he hoped the Congress would pass a bill of a permanent nature; and former President Hoover, the only living ex-President we have with us today—and let us hope that he will be with us for many, many years to come—also is in complete agreement with President Truman. Each is in agreement with the other. Here we have one, the present President, one a former President, one elected as a Democrat, the other elected as a Republican, both urging the Congress of the United States to make this type of legislation permanent. I appreciate the fears entertained by those who want a limitation, and in disagreement I want any Member to know that I thoroughly respect his views and his right to entertain the views he has; but I think in the light of the evidence, in the light of the situation that confronts us now, and with our experience that we can take this step with permanent legislation particularly when two such eminent Americans as the President of the United States and a former President of the United States, both men of experience as Chief Executive of this country, are agreed on it.

One is the leader, from a party standpoint, of the Democratic Party. Notice I did not say as President, but as leader. As President he is President of all the people. He is a leader of the Democratic Party. No one will disagree with the statement that former President Hoover is one of the outstanding leaders of our country today and probably the recognized leader of the Republican Party. I think we can accept their judgment in the light of their past experience with confidence and vote to have this legislation permanent in nature.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JUDD. I concur in the estimate the gentleman has made of the two individuals of whom he has been speaking. If when the act expires we have a President in whom everybody has confidence there will of course be no difficulty in extending it. But if the day comes when we have a President in whom we do not have confidence, we cannot easily end the power granted. He would veto our action and it would require a two-thirds vote. A doctor hopes for the best but prepares for the worst. If we should someday get a man as President that we cannot trust, we have given away our chance of bringing this power back to the legislative body. It is just when we might want to take it back that we would find we cannot.

Mr. McCORMACK. I stated that I respect the views of those who disagree with me; however, I think my friend is reacting to fear.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment conclude in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, the only proposition involved here is whether or not we are going to make this a law of men or a law of the country. As I see it, under this proposal we are making the President of the United States supreme. It is my duty, after swearing to uphold the Constitution of the United States, to make this a country of laws and not of men. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, this does not make it a country of laws but a country of men.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DAWSON. Does the gentleman appreciate that if there ever should come a time when we have a President in whom the Congress does not have confidence, and he sent down a reorganization plan to the Congress, the Congress could reject that plan?

Mr. NICHOLSON. We probably could.

Mr. DAWSON. Is it the gentleman's understanding of the bill that the power to reject is always in the Congress?

Mr. NICHOLSON. I do not think it is in the Congress. Under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan there is a limitation, namely, 1953. Under the bill as it is presently written they have an opportunity to keep it there forever, so far as he is concerned.

Mr. DAWSON. The President submits a plan to the Congress and the Congress can reject under the method provided by this bill. Is that the gentleman's understanding of the bill?

Mr. NICHOLSON. I know what the bill provides, but I have seen bills work. If a party is in control all the time, then they go along with the President, or I assume they do.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLSON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. Does not the gentleman think that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD], hit the nail on the head when he said that we are placing a power in the hands of the President which in order to get back would require a two-thirds vote of the House and a two-thirds vote of the Senate in order to get it back into the hands of the Congress? Therefore we ought to have a time limit on this legislation. It seems to me that is most important. A lot of times some of you gentlemen have voted for legislation to give power to the Chief Executive and then have later regretted it. You had better be careful that you are not going to give away your birthright again.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I also agree with the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD]. I am afraid of giving one man control of anything, and as long as we have an opportunity I think we ought to take advantage of it and go along with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WILLIAM L. PFEIFFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WILLIAM L. PFEIFFER. I have heard a great deal about putting a lot of trust in the Chief Executive. Does the gentleman not feel that we ought to have the same trust in this body 4 years from now; that it might be possible to extend the time if it was found necessary to be extended?

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, I want a law written on books so that we will know what the law is, and not depend upon whether a man is honest or dishonest or whether he is a good executive or a bad one. If you want to put something in the law, write it in there so that the people will know what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HALLECK: Page 7, line 20, after the word "commission" strike out the period and insert the following: "National Mediation Board, National Railroad Adjustment Board, Railroad Retirement Board, Federal Communications Commission, Civil Aeronautics Board, United States Tariff Commission, National Labor Relations Board, Federal Trade Commission, and Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation."

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, in general debate I spoke on this matter at some length and I do not know as it is necessary to repeat too much of that now. I recalled then and I think probably I should recall now, because some of you may not have been here, that as these basic reorganization proposals have come up here from time to time there has been experienced on both sides of the aisle a great concern about the possible threat to the independence of action of the great quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial bodies of the Government. They are the creatures of the Congress. They are to carry out the will of the Congress. They should not be subjected to political control and certainly their actions and their decisions which so vitally affect the economy of the country should not be in the realm of political action. That is why many of us through the years have sought to protect their independence. That generally took the effect of specific exemptions in the legislation that we passed. Most recently, in 1945, there were a number of specific exemptions, and there was also language in that act that undertook to prohibit the limitation of the exercise of the independence of these agencies in respect to their quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial functions. Also in the 1945 act was a new device. It was a device that did not provide for exemption, and this amendment that I have provides for no exemption, but that device simply said that in respect to these great agencies any reorganization proposal affecting them shall come up here independent of any other reorganization proposal.

That is just simply so the Congress could act on that proposal without any reference to any other proposal, and make its determination. I say it does provide some fair safeguard for the continuing independence of those agencies and at the same time can affect in no way the effective operation of this legislation.

If you have before you a copy of the bill, you will find on page 7, in subsection (b), in the last of that paragraph, four different agencies are so treated. They are not exempted, but it just simply is provided that separate plans shall come up for them. They are the National Military Establishment, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Securities and Exchange Commission. My amendment would simply add to that list a list that I assume is in this legislation with administration approval—in fact, I know it is in there that way because it has been so stated in the papers.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is included in the list of four presently in the bill. The Civil Aeronautics Administration is the same kind of an agency. It regulates the air carriers just as the ICC regulates the surface carriers.

As I said earlier in the debate, I want to support this legislation. I am supporting it. I worked on the committee in support of it. I offered this amendment in the committee. If any of you thinks that someone in some agency has pressured me into offering this amendment, may I disabuse your mind. No one has spoken to me about it. My action in this regard comes only from a deep conviction about the matter and a deep sense of the responsibility that I feel I owe the country in respect to the preservation of the independence of action of these great agencies.

I trust that this amendment can be adopted. As I say, it is no exemption, let us understand that. It simply provides that in respect to any one of these agencies the matter would come here free and clear of any sort of an entanglement, before the Congress could act on it.

I recall how the gentleman from Georgia came before the committee to get in there the language "National Military Establishment." He was quite vehement and vigorous in his contentions before the committee. He said, "All we want is our day in court in the Congress of the United States. All we want is the right to come in before the Congress and debate whatever plan may be up there affecting the Military Establishment, and not have it involved with other considerations."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for one additional minute, so that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I am very much interested in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Does the gentleman's amendment include that?

Mr. HALLECK. Yes, it does.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I think that should not be disturbed.

Mr. HALLECK. That was given the same treatment in the 1945 act. Also the Railroad Retirement Board, the Mediation Board—I have that language here before me, but they were given the same treatment.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I certainly do not want this agency to go into the Federal Reserve.

Mr. HALLECK. I know many people have had concern about that.

This treatment in the 1945 act was accorded the Federal Communications Commission, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the United States Tariff Commission, and the Veterans' Administration. I did not include the Veterans' Administration.

I might also add that there was specific exemption in the 1945 act for the National Mediation Board, the National Railroad Adjustment Board, the Railroad Retirement Board, and the civil functions of the Army engineers.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I congratulate the gentleman on leaving the Veterans' Administration out of the provisions of his amendment because the Commission is making a special report to the Congress on the Veterans' Administration alone. The Veterans' Administration will be considered by the President and by the Congress as a single entity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we have another illustration by the offering of this amendment of an experience in connection with this legislation. In the first bill there were 21 exemptions. That was due to fear. In a later bill there were 12 or 14 exemptions and they were based on fear. Of course, it was honestly entertained at the time. But as time passed on and we gained experience we realized that in many cases some of our fears were unjustified. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana will add a number of other agencies to the formula established by this bill in relation to the four agencies. The adoption of the amendment will only hinder reorganization and not help it.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. Of course, this is not an exemption to begin with. But does the gentleman contend that the inclusion of the four agencies named in the bill is a hindrance to reorganization?

Mr. McCORMACK. I did not say that those were exemptions. I said they were additions to the formula already in the bill.

Mr. HALLECK. If the additions will hinder reorganization, then will the gentleman say that the inclusion of the four agencies hindered reorganization?

Mr. McCORMACK. They hinder it much less than if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is adopted. We are very practical men. We realize there were 21 exemptions in the first bill which were placed in the bill because of practical considerations. Then as we gained experience because of practical considerations there were 12 or 14 exemptions. Then we have had several more years of practical experience. As a result of that, we have had no exemptions, but specific reorganizations in the case of four of our agencies; that is, three agencies and one department. Again that is the result of practical experience. Now, what does former President Hoover say in his testimony on this particular subject?

The reasons for his views against any exemptions are:

> I do not know any method by which the Congress can make a differentiation of executive and quasi legislative and quasi judicial functions in these agencies. It might be possible to arrive at such a definition with regard to them, but we have to bear in mind that there are such functions—quasi-judicial and quasi-legislative—in practically every department of the Government. We immediately get into difficulties if we try to make definitions. On the other hand, it would seem to me that Congress has an ample check on any action that would undermine those judicial and legislative functions when the President makes his proposed plans, and I should not imagine he is going to propose to do otherwise than to remove purely executive functions.

Mr. HALLECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. Speaking of the matter of hindrance, the gentleman earlier referred to the reorganization proposal in respect to the Civil Aeronautics Administrator. As I remember it, that was carried through to a successful conclusion, and it came up here as an order standing by itself, and affecting nothing other than the Civil Aeronautics Administrator. So there was accomplishment under this very formula in respect to that agency.

Mr. McCORMACK. And the gentleman will remember the furor that was raised at the time, and the fears that were entertained that it was going to put the agency into politics and that decisions would be made along political lines, and that it would lose its independence, although it was given independence within the Department of Commerce. None of the dire predictions has resulted.

Earlier in the day I called attention to a situation where the intent of Congress in the establishment of independent agencies has outgrown itself. It is not a question of one or two agencies that are arms of the Congress. We now have many of them. They are performing both quasi-legislative, quasi-judicial, and executive functions. We have established for all practical purposes—and this has no application to the Department of National Defense, because that is a department in itself—we have established in these independent agencies, for all practical purposes, a fourth department of government, and it is not enumerated in the Constitution.

The adoption of this amendment now, in the light of the experience we have had, in my opinion, would be a serious hindrance to real reorganization, and I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. DAWSON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this amendment, and all amendments thereto, be limited to 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this time is taken to state that if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON], speaking previously, intended to say that I had some distrust of the motives of either former President Hoover or the present occupant of the White House, he was completely mistaken. I am not distrusting anybody, and I want that made perfectly clear.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. DAWSON. I wish the gentleman to know I have the highest opinion of him and that no word of mine was intended to impute to the gentleman anything but the highest motives. My words were not calculated to state a feeling as stated by the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is very kind, and I thank the gentleman very, very much.

This amendment is not a move to exempt these agencies, neither the four nor the additional ones proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK]. If you will read the section, you will notice that all that section requires is that these plans, as to this, that, or the other department, come up one at a time; just one at a time, so that the Congress may have an opportunity to act intelligently on the plan.

You will all recall that some time ago the President sent up three or more reorganization plans. One of those plans included three separate and distinct proposals, and it was rejected. It was rejected because of the inclusion, with two good ones, of one that the Congress, both the House and the Senate, considered inadvisable. That is why I think the committee accepted the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], with reference to the Military Establishment. And then the others were added.

Now, the present amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] merely asks that these other departments be considered in the same way. If the President wants to send up a plan, he should send it up in one package—not two, but one—so that the Congress will have an opportunity, both Houses, to act. We can get along with this thing very quickly.

When he was on the floor before the gentleman from Indiana asked the gentleman from Illinois to yield, the gentleman from Illinois yielded. Then the gentleman from Indiana said:

> I am wondering if the gentleman would agree with me that with the basic work that has been done by the so-called Hoover Commission with the enactment of this legislation and with the fact that the Congress is now Democratic as is the Chief Executive, this job ought to be accomplished in the next 2 years.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON] replied:

> I think we ought to get a reorganization plan submitted to this Congress within the next few months.

There you are. In the revision made by the gentleman I notice the gentleman said, "Within a very short time."

So if these plans will come up one at a time, one agency at a time reorganized, the Congress can very easily pass upon that one simple question; so I think we should have this amendment.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. JENNINGS. As I understand it, these agencies named in the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] are agencies that have been created by this Congress and that in the discharge of their duties they are independent of the control of the Chief Executive, just like a court would be to act upon a lawsuit brought before it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is right.

Mr. JENNINGS. But if they are included within this reorganization plan, then the President could reduce them to mere automatons or people who could be pushed about and whose decisions might be controlled by the Executive.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Not only that but I venture to bring it up here, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] insisted with reference to the armed services—and I remember he appeared before the committee and there were 45 votes he told us on his committee. I do not think that was with any intimation that we ought to watch out for those 45 votes, but anyway he told us of those votes.

There is no reason at all why these other agencies should not come up in the same way. They are entitled to just as much consideration, I say, as the one that comes before the committee of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON]. I notice he has nodded his head. I wish he would get up and make a talk.

Mr. VINSON. I will in a minute.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Make a talk now before my time runs out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief statement?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield.

Mr. BREHM. Would not this amendment, if adopted, prevent these railroad agencies from being absorbed, or taken up by some other agency or department, without having their day in court, without giving them a right to be heard? I am particularly interested in the Railroad Retirement Board, the Railway Mediation Board, and the National Railway Adjustment Board. I would like to see them if possible have their day in court before they are absorbed into some other agency. These organizations are self-supporting and do not cost the taxpayers one cent for administration or any other purpose.

Mr. DAWSON. The answer to the gentleman's question is "No"; they would have their day in court under the bill as written.

Mr. BREHM. They would?

Mr. DAWSON. They would.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time and ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HALLECK) there were—ayes 86, noes 151.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAILEY: On page 7, line 20, after the words "Securities and Exchange Commission", strike out the period, insert a comma and add "Railroad Retirement Board, National Mediation Board, and National Railroad Retirement Adjustment Board."

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Chairman, these agencies were included in the amendment that has just been defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may say to the gentleman that this is a different amendment in that in the previous amendment there were additional agencies included. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, despite the action taken on the previous amendment I want to press for the adoption of the present one. I predicate my position on the assumption that the committee which studied this legislation and reported it to the House must have had some sound, basic reasons for extending preferential consideration to the National Military Establishment, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Securities and Exchange Commission. I submit, Mr. Chairman, there are sound basic reasons why the Railroad Retirement Board, the National Mediation Board, and the National Railroad Adjustment Board should be extended this same preferential treatment.

May I call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that the Railroad Retirement Board is not a Government functioning body. There are no governmental tax moneys involved. This is a Board created and financed by assessments against the wages of the individual workers in the railroad industry and the railroad companies. The Government only functions in the status of a trustee. I never heard tell of a trusteeship being dissolved except by some order of the court. I thought a trusteeship once set up was sacred. Yet we are proposing to bring this in under one of the other departments of our Government which may drag these agencies into politics. If there is one thing you can say about its administration and its functioning in the past it has been free of politics. What is said about the Railroad Retirement Act can also be said about the Railroad Mediation Board. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that there has been less trouble between labor and management in the functioning of that Board than in all the other labor legislation.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JENNINGS. I entirely agree with my distinguished friend. A large number of railroad employees from my home town of Knoxville brought that very question up to me as I came in this Chamber this morning. It would be a blunder, and I think a grievous blunder, to interfere in any manner with the independent, impartial status of those agencies.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BREHM. I also agree with the gentleman. A bit ago I asked the question if they would have their day in court, and the chairman of the committee assured me that they would have. Now, would it not be possible, if this legislation becomes a law, to group these railway agencies in with other legislation which might have some good features in it, and then have the railway organizations become lost in the shuffle and become part of the Labor. Department?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. BREHM. Which we do not want.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman is right.

Mr. BREHM. I will support the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. In addition, let me say that I assume the object of this reorganization bill is one of economy. I remember that there was a tremendous amount of savings stressed when the committee proposing this legislation reported it. The assumption is that you will be able to let out hundreds of thousands of Federal workers. I want to say to you that there are probably less than 150 or 200 employees involved in all three or four of these railroad boards for which I am asking this preferential treatment. You will not effect any savings to speak of, because there are only a few employees attached to each one of the functions. I would also like to ask the consideration of the House that we keep, so far as possible, just as many of our governmental functions out of politics as possible. I believe it can be said of these railroad functions that they are not now and have not been matters of party politics, and I strenuously object to their inclusion in one of the ordinary functions.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I will say to the gentleman that he realizes that the Railroad Retirement Act sets up the Railroad Retirement Board and that the function thereof is basic legislation; that no change could be made in the death benefits or the pensions or any other functions of that act. It would require enabling legislation to be sent to the Congress, and if any administrative economy could be performed within the Board itself, the gentleman certainly would not object to the President, who is deeply concerned with the rights of labor, presenting a plan for the Congress to decide upon that would recommend certain economic or efficiency measures within it without changing any of the basic provisions.

Mr. BREHM. How about the Social Security Administration?

Mr. BAILEY. I will answer the gentleman by saying that regardless of what action we may take, it is still a trust fund and I do not think that Congress should have any business dealing with it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend any remarks that I make on the floor today.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. For a question.

Mr. BREHM. I just want to say that in my opinion it would be a shame to put any of the railroad boards under the Social Security Administration, which could happen if this legislation passes as it is now written.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. It would be worse if you put it under the Labor Board.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been wondering what position the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON] are going to take on this amendment. As I said a moment ago, I do not distrust or challenge the motives of the President or of any former President nor, I may add, of any Member of the House or the other body, but I try to be a realist. But it is strange indeed that all the trust must be on one side. If we should not and if we do not mistrust the present President, why should not the President trust the present Congress, or at least trust a majority of the 435 Members of this body, a majority of the 96 Members of the other body?

Why not mutual trust? Why not require the other body and the House, or at least one body entrusted with the legislative power, to act, as the Constitution contemplated, affirmatively upon any matter presented to it before the matter became the law of the land? I am wondering now, when from the press, at least, yes, when from a committee of the other body, the Labor Committee, come reports that the Secretary of Labor came up and asked for the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, and if I understood correctly, the reenactment of the Wagner Act. He asked for the transfer of the Mediation Service over to the Department of Labor. He is going to make the National Labor Relations Board, if he gets the legislation he wants, a part of the Department of Labor.

We notice in the press that organized labor is saying to the President, "We elected you," and let me add that they are saying that to the Members of the House and I assume to the Members of the other body. "We elected you; now, come on. Give us what we say you promised during the campaign."

The CIO is only one segment of labor. The railroad men are laborers and workers, too. They are saying, "If this railroad legislation and the railroad organizations are going to be at the mercy of the President, if he wants to send down a plan sticking them over in the Department of Labor, reject it. We do not want that." Do you gentlemen in the majority want these independent agencies or their functions, their duties, transferred to the Department of Labor, which is under the control of or is favorable—and rightly so—to organized labor? But to all of it—not just to the CIO as it seems to assume.

Of course, the Labor Department speaks for organized labor, but unfortunately at the moment it is speaking for one segment of organized labor. The CIO assumes that it elected the President and a majority of the Members of Congress, so they are demanding now—not only asking, they are demanding now—that the Congress come across and pay for that election by legislation favorable to it. Put some of these agencies like the Railway Retirement Board in Social Security or the Labor Department and soon you may find CIO again raiding the A. F. of L. and perhaps the railway unions.

I agree with the gentleman who just left the well of the House that labor legislation which applies to the railroad workers has worked exceptionally well over the years. No one has found any particular fault with it. So if it is to be tampered with—let us say, if it is to be improved, let it come up as the gentleman then proposed, in one package, so that the Congress, this House and the other body, may have the opportunity of saying whether we want that labor organization to be transferred over to and put under the jurisdiction of the Labor Department or the Social Security Agency.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is just some of the procedure that the Congresses have faced in past years and have yielded to, and by virtue of having yielded, have passed bills that did not enable the President to do the job they were hoping he would do.

You saw these organizations or these branches or agencies named here included in an amendment a few moments ago. You saw them voted down. Then you saw them come to us once again standing by themselves, on the theory that we are going to do something to them, that this bill does something to them.

This bill is not going to put any agency anywhere. This bill is not going to interfere with any agency, to take anything from them or give them anything. This bill is plainly enabling legislation in order to give the power to the President to do a job of reorganization that must be done.

All these agencies that come and ask us now to make special provision for them are but the creatures of ourselves, the creatures of the Congress. Any plan the President submits or draws up or presents must come back to the Congress once again.

The legislation provides that the plan must be sent to the Congress. After the plan comes to the Congress, the Speaker of the House will refer it to the appropriate committee. There the committee is given a certain length of time to take action on it. Then a friend of any agency that is affected by that plan—not by this legislation but by that plan which the President submits—may file a resolution to reject it. That goes to the committee. If they do not act on it, then any member who is in favor of that resolution can move to discharge the committee and bring it to the floor of the Congress. Therefore, this bill makes adequate provision to protect every agency. The President cannot do anything to any agency unless it comes back to the Congress. What are we going to do here today? Are we going to pass a bill which is going to do the job which should be done? If any of these agencies are examined and if any of the Executive powers can be changed to the benefit of the taxpayers, should not that be done? In 1 minute we hear talk about the size of the Government and how the agencies are eating up the taxpayers money. I have heard Members standing here telling us about some of these same agencies which now do not want to be included in this bill. They tell us that they have grown so big that no Congressman can talk to them any more.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. I yield.

Mr. BONNER. Under the decision recently rendered by the Chair, if this amendment carries, then it will follow that each item which was defeated in the so-called Halleck amendment can come up one by one and other items can come up one by one. Thus you will be here all afternoon voting on separate agencies when they have all been beaten collectively in the so-called Halleck amendment.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. Chairman, may I say further, we have had our public hearings. Every agency had an opportunity to appear before us. If there were any reasons then to do the thing which they seek to have you do now, your committee would have acted thereon. Therefore, I am saying that this is but an instance of how former Congresses have failed to do the thing we are now trying to do. We have endeavored to bring to the Committee of the Whole a bill that will work. We have tried to bring to this committee a bill under which the President can reorganize the executive departments and do all the things that we have been talking about. The terms of the legislation are clear. There are no exemptions in it, and there should be no exemptions in it.

The President is not going to interfere with any agency that is functioning in the best interests of the people. If the President did interfere, do you not know that officials of that agency would immediately alert the very Members who are standing here now?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCORMACK. Was not the unanimous consent request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON] limiting debate granted by the Committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is referring to a request made concerning the previous amendment and which does not apply to the pending amendment.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, my purpose is to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. The gentleman has made very much of a point of the fact that exemption of this railroad retirement group would prevent a great deal of money being saved to the taxpayers. I would like to have you show me how in any way, if you cut down the amount of money that is spent by that organization, cut it in half, how you would in any way help the taxpayers, bearing in mind that of the money that is paid to the Railroad Retirement Board, 6 percent comes out of the employee and 6 percent from the employer. How would you save the taxpayers any money? This is truly an independent function.

Mr. DAWSON. Are there any administrative workers there at all? Do they exercise any functions of the executive department at all?

Mr. WITHROW. They are all paid out of the money that comes into the fund by reason of the 6 percent that is taken from the employee's wages, and the 6 percent that is paid to the Railroad Retirement Board by the railroad companies.

Mr. DAWSON. This bill does nothing to destroy any function set up by law, nor can any reorganization plan of the President do that; but if there are any executive functions, either in itself or related to other agencies, then the President can combine them, in order to have them work more efficiently, or for the sake of economy, and then it will be brought down in a plan, and if it is not a good plan, you and the others in this Congress, including myself, will reject that plan.

Mr. WITHROW. The gentleman has not answered my question. My question is: How will the taxpayers be saved any money, if you cut the railroad retirement administration 50 percent?

Mr. DAWSON. If you cut it in two, you would be bound to save some money.

Mr. WITHROW. Where would that money go? It would go back into the fund, would it not?

Mr. DAWSON. Certainly.

Mr. WITHROW. And how would it save the taxpayers any money?

Mr. DAWSON. If in its administrative function any of the personnel can be cut down which are paid for by the Government, then that will be a saving to the taxpayers. Your question has nothing to do with the Government. You seek to intimate that this legislation can affect basic legislation where we set up an agency. That cannot be done under this bill and that cannot be done under any reorganization plan proposed by the President.

Mr. WITHROW. You are attempting to place me in a position that I will not be placed in.

Mr. DAWSON. And you are attempting to put words into my mouth.

Mr. WITHROW. No; just a moment. I am in favor of this legislation. I have confidence that the President of the United States will do a good job, but I do object to your saying that it is going to save the taxpayers any money when the taxpayers do not have anything to do with this Board.

Mr. DAWSON. There are some of its functions that are executive. Then those employees must be paid by the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW] has expired.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BONNER] made the very point which has disturbed me so much. The gentleman said that if we now pass this amendment relating to the railroad boards, then each of the others previously voted down in the Halleck amendment will come up in turn, and you will be voting on all of them all over again. That is exactly what can happen to the Railroad Retirement Board, the Mediation Service, and the Adjustment Board. They can be lost in the shuffle. They can be pushed into another agency, say, like Social Security, and be brought up here and thereby lose their identity. What is wrong in permitting those agencies to be brought up here separately and acted upon? You bring them up in one large package and there may be incorporated in that particular package something which may be good; and you will destroy them. That is exactly what I am fearful of. You will vote for the good in the package and take the evil along with it.

Mr. DAWSON. That very thing would prevent the President from ever putting a bad plan in with a good plan.

Mr. BREHM. Oh, he is still a human being and subject to the frailties of human nature. A person can be sincere and still make mistakes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREHM. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Just a moment ago the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BONNER] made a statement that we wanted to vote on this bill tonight and therefore we should not fool around with quite so much debate, or words to that effect.

Mr. BONNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BONNER. The gentleman is not correct. Now, let us get it straight. The question that is now being debated has been debated and has been voted on. By a ruling of the Chair, the question has arisen again individually, or in this case with two or three other organizations thrown in.

Mr. BREHM. It is not going to cost anyone a penny nor is it going to save a penny for anyone if this amendment prevails. However, it may save a most essential service to the railway brotherhoods for which they and their employers have been paying for the past 10 years.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes; all right; and under——

Mr. DAWSON. So it is just a repetition of the debate and a repetition of the decision which the committee has already made.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I admire the gentleman very much. I am sorry I cannot agree with him in this instance. We should have some opportunity to debate the bill. If you expect to finish this bill tonight, do not force us too much.

Neither in the committee nor in the House has anyone on the minority side raised the slightest objection or done anything to delay matters, but we do want to discuss some of these items; and, if you go to strict parliamentary procedure and gag us, you cannot possibly vote on this bill tonight if somebody wants to object; not tonight. All we want is a little consideration.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BAILEY) there were—ayes 122, noes 99.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS of Florida: Page 7, line 20, after the period insert the following: "No reorganization plan containing any provision affecting any civil function of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army or of its head, or affecting such Corps or its head with respect to such civil functions shall take effect until the two Houses of Congress pass a concurrent resolution which states in substance that the Congress favors such new reorganization plan."

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I am not an enemy to this legislation; this is a friendly amendment and I am supporting this bill because I believe this Congress should approve of anything that would bring economy in our Government, less spending, and more efficient Government, and the doing away with duplication and overlapping.

I am sure none of us has had any criticism of the Corps of United States Army Engineers. They are doing a wonderful job. They have been in existence for 174 years and I do not know of any organization plan that could better the operations of this particular branch of our Government.

I am not asking by my amendment that the Corps of Engineers be exempted from any reorganization plan. In the act that we passed in 1945 that organization was exempted and I have used the same language in this amendment as was used in section 5, subsection (e), of the reorganization bill passed in 1945.

We are all satisfied with what the Army Engineers are doing. They work in peacetime taking care of our floods, taking care of our rivers and harbors, and taking care of a lot of our problems that are particularly interesting to our local governments.

I do not see how anyone can have any possible objection to my amendment. My amendment says that before any reorganization plan in reference to the Corps of Engineers shall go into effect the Congress must approve by concurrent resolution. In other words, it is affirmative action instead of negative action. If we take it as it is and they are involved in some reorganization plan, then we have to act within a period of 60 days, else the plan becomes effective.

The Corps of Army Engineers is primarily for the people. This is something you ought to be interested in. I do not want any plan to go into effect, whether proposed by the President or anybody else, until the Congress has had an opportunity to scrutinize the program and the purposes therein. When the Congress has it up for consideration, the Congress could say: "Mr. President, you have done a good job, and we approve it. The Corps of Engineers ought to be changed." When that happens and the Congress agrees, good and well. The organization itself is not exempted.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. If the Corps of Engineers are not taken out of the bill where do they go and how do they function?

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I cannot answer that question because I do not know where they are going. But if we adopt this amendment, before anything is done, before any plan becomes operative and effective, this Congress by affirmative vote must say it is a good plan and we must affirmatively adopt it by a concurrent resolution of the Congress. It takes action on the part of both Houses. If we get some plan that is not good we can reject it. This is simply a question of whether we are going forward or backward.

Mr. DONDERO. I agree with the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. WHITE of California. The gentleman said that he could not answer the gentleman's question in regard to where the civil functions of the Army Engineers would go. I think I have the answer. Those functions could be taken over by the United States Bureau of Reclamation, insofar as reclamation projects are concerned, or flood control, in areas where reclamation, irrigation, power, and flood control go together, and they certainly should be combined.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Nothing could be done so far as the Army Engineers are concerned, and no plan could become effective until the House and Senate by affirmative action stated it could be. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I respectfully request the attention of the committee while I try to explain what is meant by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida, and what is proposed in subsection (b). The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] asked if by using the words "National Military Establishment" it included the civil functions. I respectfully call his attention and the attention of the committee to the Security Act of July 26, 1947, which specifically sets out what constitutes the National Military Establishment. It states:

> The National Military Establishment shall consist of the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, and the Department of the Air Force, together with all other agencies created under title I of this act.

So there can be no doubt, wherever used in the law, the words "National Military Establishment" do include all component parts of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. Then there can be no doubt in the gentleman's mind that the civil functions of the Army Engineers is a secondary matter with them, and that their connection with the Army itself brings them within this bill.

Mr. VINSON. Absolutely; there is no doubt about it. This amendment was prepared by the Drafting Service not only of the Armed Services Committee but by the Drafting Service of the House, so the House can fully understand that wherever used in here, "National Military Establishment" means the civil functions of the Army Engineers.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I thoroughly concur in the statement made by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, and I want the RECORD to show that in putting the National Military Establishment in here, that the committee intended that that included the United States engineers within this formula.

Mr. VINSON. If there is any doubt in any man's mind, and to make it doubly sure, after the words "National Military Establishment," someone could offer an amendment to put in brackets "including the civil functions of the Department of the Army." But there is absolutely no need to do so because the words "National Military Establishment" mean all components of these services.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, is it not true that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts was at one time a member of the committee from which this bill originates, and is now?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am a member now.

Mr. VINSON. To set the record straight, I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments if he does not interpret the words "National Military Establishment" to include the civil functions of the Department of the Army.

Mr. DAWSON. That was the understanding of the committee, and the language was used with that in view.

Mr. VINSON. That is it exactly.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Would this give the President the power to delimit the jurisdiction of the Engineers? For instance, one of the members suggested that they should not build any more stands. Could the President take out that part and the rivers and harbors part?

Mr. VINSON. In 2 or 3 minutes I will explain what this amendment does. I appeared before the committee and suggested that an amendment along this line be considered. The committee after considerable debate reached the conclusion to draft it in the language set out in the bill.

Now, what does it do? I am addressing this strictly to the Military Establishment. It simply means if the President of the United States wished to submit to the Congress a reorganization plan to take the civil functions of the Corps of Engineers away from the War Department and put it in the Interior Department, he would have to send that up here in a reorganization plan separate and distinct. It could not be tied in with any reorganization plan with reference to any other civil agencies or functions of different departments. It would have to come here so that the Congress could determine that sole cut issue, and, of course, as a Member of the House, if such an issue comes up, I would be very much opposed to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is still this question: Could they take part of the jurisdiction of the Engineers away from them?

Mr. VINSON. He could not touch the Corps of Engineers or any agency of the National Military Establishment and mix it up with any other function of the Government. They have to come here separate and distinct. This language is so written that he cannot take one thing away. However, he can do this: He can add some other agencies to the Military Establishment without sending it separate, but he cannot take one iota of the power or authority from the Army, the Navy, or the Air Force without sending it here as a separate proposition. That is all it does.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Is it not true that my amendment is in accord with the bill?

Mr. VINSON. The gentleman's amendment would disturb the whole situation, because he would require it to be an affirmative act instead of a negative act. He would require that the Congress would have to approve it in a particular resolution by a vote of the House and Senate, and the bill is based on a different basis.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Is it not true that they would have to do that anyhow, according to the statement made here? Before the organization could do anything there would have to be a plan?

Mr. VINSON. The provisions of the bill are such that when it comes in here the committee taking jurisdiction of it must act within a certain time. If one House disapproves it and the other House approves it, it becomes a reorganization plan. The gentleman's statement provides that before it can become a reorganization plan it must have the sanction of both Houses.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Does it not also mean that if this amendment is adopted the President could not take the Corps of Engineers or the civil functions and place them over in the Department of the Interior, and then say to that Department, "From now on you shall have charge of all the river and harbor work of this country"?

Mr. VINSON. He would have the authority to do so. He would have the authority to take the Marines and put them in the Army. He would have the authority to take Naval Aviation and put it in the Air Force. But when he would do it, he would have to send it to Congress on that one issue and then Congress could debate it. I am perfectly willing on any reorganization plan to have an opportunity to present the reasons why certain things should not take place.

Mr. DONDERO. But only in case the gentleman's amendment passes this House.

Mr. VINSON. No. His amendment would disturb it.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman is the chairman of the committee on which I have the honor to serve. May I say that I am, of course, deeply concerned that the status of the Engineers be not changed.

Mr. VINSON. So am I.

Mr. BROOKS. I am happy to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. VINSON. I am very much opposed to taking them away.

Mr. BROOKS. Is not the proper interpretation of the amendment offered by the gentleman that no reorganization can occur but what every Member of the House of Representatives will have the right, in the event the committee fails to report it, to call it up for a vote before the House?

Mr. VINSON. That is right. I am merely safeguarding this organization by saying that when you propose to reorganize it you cannot mix it up, you must send it in in a separate package, and any Member of Congress, under the bill, has a right to call it up and let a majority of Congress determine what is the proper thing to do about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the gentleman will yield further, the Rogers amendment would not do that; it would just muddy the waters.

Mr. VINSON. The amendment would accomplish just exactly what I have said. It is as plain as the nose on your face.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it the Rogers amendment about which the gentleman is talking?

Mr. VINSON. I am talking about what is in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, but the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS] has offered an amendment.

Mr. VINSON. His amendment in the first place is not necessary, because the Corps of Engineers is within the purview of the committee bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. VINSON. Yes, exactly. Therefore, I am asking this Committee to vote down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS] because it is not necessary. The Corps of Engineers is amply protected. We will have a separate vote on it whenever it comes in here. That is not the only thing in the reorganization of the Department of National Defense that might come up. There are other important items that might come up.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield.

Mr. PICKETT. Under the present law which you favor, if there were a reorganization proposal for the National Military Establishment set down which provided for something that the House did not approve of and the House rejected the proposal, it would still go to the other body and if approved there, the reorganization plan would take effect, would it not?

Mr. VINSON. That is the provision in the bill and it not only relates to this, but relates to everything else in the bill.

Mr. PICKETT. Therefore, the language of the present bill does not actually take care of the situation that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS] is directed to.

Mr. VINSON. I believe that if we could justify a negative decision on a proposal, the other body would probably go along with our viewpoint.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto end in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON]?

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto end in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, may I ask if there was a demand for a reading of the engrossed copy, would there be a vote on this bill tonight?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would advise the gentleman from Michigan that such a question would arise in the House and not in the Committe of the Whole. Therefore, the Chair cannot pass on the gentleman's inquiry at this time.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER].

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, of course, the committee realizes what discussion can be made about this matter in 1 minute, but I will use that 1 minute to make this brief statement.

If the gentleman from Georgia, the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, and others profess a great respect for the Army engineers that we all entertain, then why not adopt this amendment and end this question now as to whether or not the Army engineers ought to be disturbed. I would much prefer to go further than this and write a direct exemption here with reference to the Army engineers because it's the one arm of this Government which enjoys the confidence and respect of every Member of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LARCADE].

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to address you as a member of the Committee on Public Works to say that I regret very much that the gentleman from Mississippi, the chairman of the committee, Hon. WILLIAM M. WHITTINGTON, whose judgment is respected so highly by the Members of the House, and who has taken such an active part in flood control and rivers and harbors work in the Congress for the last 20 years and who has been dealing with the Corps of Engineers during all of that time, was called away for a flood-control meeting in St. Louis, and as a result I know that he is missed in this debate by the Members of the House. Had it not been for the fact that our chairman made a previous engagement several months ago, he would have been here today. However, I do want to say that I have contacted the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] in regard to the section with respect to the Corps of Engineers under discussion, and that it is his opinion that, under the provisions of this legislation the Corps of Engineers are protected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TACKETT].

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Chairman, I will yield my 1 minute to the next speaker.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKETT] is recognized.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Rogers amendment. I think the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] stated the case exactly a moment ago when he said this issue ought to be decided now. Under the proposed bill, as it is presented by the committee and as it will be passed unless the Rogers amendment is adopted, you have a situation where if a reorganization plan involving the Corps of Army Engineers is submitted, you must take positive action to reject that proposal in both Houses, else the proposal will become operative and become a part of the reorganization plan. Under the Rogers amendment you are required to act affirmatively, in both bodies, upon the proposed reorganization plan. So you have this situation under the bill as the committee wants it passed: A proposed reorganization plan involving the Corps of Engineers might be deemed to have no merit and be rejected by the House, but the other body may not do so. Then the proposed plan becomes operative as a reorganization plan though the House has rejected it. The Rogers amendment corrects that situation and requires affirmative action by both Houses approving it before such a proposed plan can become operative. The amendment then is a guaranty that no amalgamation of the Corps of Engineers to the detriment of its performance can be effected.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKETT] has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS].

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I have already spoken on this amendment. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point, and I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply sensitive of the need for reorganization legislation. At the same time, I am not unmindful of the magnificent work which has been performed by the Corps of Army Engineers. I express the deep concern which I feel that some misguided reorganization plan may affect this great organization. I think any plan which may affect the organizational integrity of the engineers would be a serious mistake and may hurt our defense establishment.

I have seen the Corps of Engineers work, both in war and in peace, and I feel that we have just the set-up which is most conducive to a well-trained and efficient Corps of Engineers. The country generally is satisfied that they are doing the job efficiently and wants no change.

I recognize that the Committee in drafting this measure was compelled to follow fundamental rules. The Committee did not wish to exempt any agency from the operation of this bill. But the Committee did prescribe that the engineers and other military organizations, if they are subject to reorganization under this measure, should be placed in a separate plan so that this body may cast a separate vote upon the plan submitted. I personally would like to go further and entirely exempt the Corps of Engineers. Since this is not now practical, I am going to accept the present language of the bill with the hope that the Senate may go much further in the degree of protection which it may give to an organization which has functioned since the very beginning of this Government with superb credit to itself and to our people.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion which is at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House, with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to have to make a preferential motion, but, as stated once before, neither in committee nor on the floor of the House has there been the slightest inclination by anyone on this side to in any way delay or hinder consideration or passage of this legislation.

As a matter of fact, if I judge the sentiment on our side correctly, I know of no one who opposes the principles laid down in this bill. There are those of us who do object to the method but we are not disposed to start a filibuster, but here is an amendment that has been offered. Some of the Members want to talk about it—but are being denied the opportunity. Now, what does this amendment provide? Who now is afraid? And of what?

I spoke earlier, and I will speak later on, if occasion requires, about an amendment which will not only enable but will force the House and the other body to act one way or the other, vote up or down, any and every plan which may come down from the Executive Office.

This particular amendment seeks to make it certain that the engineers cannot be put out of business without the consent of the Congress. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON]—and I have the highest respect for his judgment and for his opinion—he, it may be said, if I might use such language on the floor, has been the daddy or the guardian of the Navy. Now he has assumed the same role, and I know of no man better qualified to take it, of all the armed forces. What he was afraid of was that if this bill went through without the amendment which he put in during consideration by the committee—requiring that any plan having to do with the armed services should come up in one package—he was afraid that by the inaction by either branch of the Congress it might go through and something might be taken out of the National Defense Establishment.

I fear he may wake up some fine day—I believe he will, if he does not watch his step—and learn that legislation affecting the Engineers, putting them out of their civil functions, will come up to the House. Then what happens? One Member of the House can bring it up and we will all vote on it. But suppose someone in the other body starts a filibuster or that no one there wants to take it up; there is nothing that can force them to take it up. We can vote the plan down; every Member in the House can vote against it; but unless we find some way of making the other body act, the plan will still be the law of the land and the Engineers or any other agency or function of an agency will be out of existence. It is that situation, it is that danger, that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS] seeks to avoid.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. VINSON. Is not what the gentleman says true of every other reorganization plan?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Of course it is; and that is why I want to preserve the constitutional method of legislating. I propose to offer an amendment which will compel this body and the other body to act before a plan can become a law.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. Do I understand that this amendment if adopted would provide for this one agency of the Government an entirely different method of procedure as far as Congressional approval or disapproval is concerned?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I dislike to answer that because the answer will mitigate against the amendment I am going to offer later on applying the same procedure to all plans which may be sent down.

The situation is this: The first love of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] is the Navy, his second love is the Army, the third is the Engineers, and the Engineers, like the Marine Corps, have worked perfectly. No one wants to see the Engineers put out of business; but if we do not watch our step, and if perchance the other body should fail to act or not act in concert with us, then the civil functions of the Engineers might in some reorganization plan go out of the Department.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. VINSON. Does not a Senator have the same right to bring up legislation on the floor of the Senate that a Member of the House has in this body?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes; sure. But will he?

Mr. VINSON. Why should we treat the Corps of Army Engineers by a separate method of determination from the others?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is just what you did with your amendment inserted by the Committee at your request as subdivision (b) of subdivision 6 of section 5 of the bill, when you provided for consideration of any plan affecting the "National Military Establishment."

Later, three other agencies were also given special treatment in reorganization plans.

I favor this amendment, because if I cannot get all I want I am willing to take what I can get to save one of our best agencies, the Engineers. Certainly any Member of the Senate could bring it up, but I ask the gentleman how long has the civil rights program been under consideration over there? Both parties are pledged to that program but strange, strange indeed, it has not been acted upon in that body.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for 1 minute to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that on the preferential motion there are 5 minutes in support of the motion and 5 in opposition.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GATHINGS] is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Chairman, the Corps of Army Engineers was started by George Washington, and was continued by every President of the United States right on down the line through Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman, all having acquiesced in the good judgment of the first President. That is the reason for this furor here; that is the reason we want to see something done about the Corps of Army Engineers. We realize that it is necessary to keep these officers busy in peacetime as well as in times of war. The peacetime accomplishments of these men are most beneficial to the Nation in an emergency

What would result if the Corps of Army Engineers were to be thrown over into the Public Works Bureau? I will tell you what that would mean. It would mean a mammoth organization with one big head possessing more power than any official in the executive branch of this Government should have. So, Mr. Chairman, we ought to support this amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida. Let us write his amendment in.

It is an affirmative expression on the part of the Congress. Should the President send over a proposal to consolidate the Corps of Engineers with some other department we, in each House, would have only 60 days to reject such a plan. The 60 days pass in a hurry sometimes and because of other important matters pending in both Houses it is difficult to obtain a vote in both Houses. I trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS] will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS] is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, while I must confess I do not exactly like the approach of the gentleman from Florida to this problem, I am going to support his amendment.

The Corps of Army Engineers has earned the gratitude and respect of all Americans. I am fearful of the pressure which has been exerted in the past and which is now being exerted to absorb the Corps of Army Engineers into some super-duper department of public works or to consolidate it with various agencies in the Department of the Interior. I am fearful of such a move. If it did happen I do not believe it would promote either economy or efficiency. The Corps of Engineers has accumulated an experience which is invaluable to the flood control and protection of this country.

I support, with reservation, his testimony insofar as the Corps of Army Engineers is concerned. I am naturally particularly concerned about the Corps of Army Engineers because I live in the city of New Orleans which is at the mouth of the Mississippi River, which drains about two-thirds of the United States of America.

We know first hand what floods are, what devastation can be wrought by the forces of nature when they are on the loose. We have lived with the Mississippi River since we have been a community and we are eternally grateful to the Corps of Army Engineers. In my judgment, there is no finer group of men in this great country of ours. They have been efficient; they have been capable; they have performed their duties without political favor or favoritism of any kind. They have been on the job in emergencies and they have accumulated, over a period of years, a tremendous amount of knowledge and experience.

I realize that we are faced with a quandary here when we talk about reorganizing the Government. Inevitably, someone appears before the responsible committee of Congress and asks that certain agencies be excluded.

I, too, favor—certainly in principle—all that this committee is attempting to do. It seems to me that the sprawling, overlapping functions of the Government must be consolidated in the interest of efficiency and economy; but in doing so I think that we must be careful not to interfere with agencies which have demonstrated, over a period of many years, their complete and total efficiency; and to my way of thinking there is no economy that could possibly be achieved by consolidating the Corps of Army Engineers with any other agency of the Government.

I do not know of anything else that I could add, Mr. Chairman, except again to say that we who have lived with the problem of flood control are immeasurably proud of the Corps of Army Engineers and we would be gravely alarmed if we felt that the Congress did anything which might jeopardize their efficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I favor the adoption of this amendment. I do not believe that the Army engineers in the performance of their civil-functions work have been influenced by political considerations whatsoever. If this civil-functions work should be transferred to some other agency, as it has been rumored was in contemplation, I greatly fear that thereafter, such work would be subject to political considerations and political influence.

So far as I know, word has not come to Congress from the executive department as to what agencies or departments will be reorganized, changed, or abolished. I do know that rumors have been current that the civil-functions work of the Army engineers may be transferred to a new department to be created.

My own opinion is that this bill should provide that either House of Congress should be able to reject a reorganization plan, and that it should not require the concurrent action of both bodies. This bill, as it now stands, would require that it be rejected by both. That reverses ordinary legislative procedure. Today the civil-functions work may not be removed from the Army engineers except by affirmative action on the part of both Houses of Congress. If this bill passes in its present form, that will no longer be the case. The House may vote to reject such a plan, but mere failure to act on the part of the other body will result in a reorganization plan going into effect.

This seems to me to be an acknowledgment that Congress is no longer able to perform the functions belonging to it under the Constitution.

The Rogers amendment will require that both Houses must concur in order to remove these functions from the engineers, and I favor this requirement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TRIMBLE].

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Chairman, I do not know when I have found myself in a happier position than I am at the present time. I am told by the chairman of the committee handling this bill and by the gentleman from Georgia, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and by the majority leader that the Corps of Engineers is safe. I am also told by the sponsor of this amendment that if it passes they are also safe.

I have a very high regard for the Corps of Engineers and its ability. The members of that Corps are not only builders but in building they learn in peacetime the things that stand them in such good stead in war. Regardless of whether this amendment is passed or not, I feel that the Corps is safe under any interpretation. I hope so, and the civil functions will remain in their hands.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD] is recognized.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, we are all concerned with the Army Corps of Engineers and we believe it has been adequately taken care of under this bill that we have brought to the committee today for consideration. We know that the legislative language is good and we ask the House to stand by the committee and vote down this superfluous amendment because it is unnecessary. We urge the House to stand by its committee.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of this bill if a reorganization plan is returned to the Congress and if the House approves it and the Senate disagrees, then we cannot interfere with the reorganization plan; is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may say to the gentleman that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PICKETT) there were—ayes 82, noes 143.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TACKETT: On page 7, line 8, strike out subsection (b).

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Chairman, this bill is intended to provide the administration with power to reorganize the various agencies of our Government by grouping, consolidating, coordinating, and abolishing any of the agencies and bureaus so as to eliminate overlapping and duplicating efforts in the hope of reducing Federal operating expenditures and promoting economy to the fullest extent consistent with the efficient operation of our Government.

Section 5 (b) of this bill is intended, in effect, to exclude four privileged agencies from the general operation and purpose of this proposed legislation. My amendment seeks to strike section 5 (b) so as to make every Federal agency subject to the provisions of the reorganization plan.

During our campaigns this last summer and fall, most of us promised to come here and support a tremendously needed reorganization bill, and I had understood by the introduction of this bill that we would be afforded the opportunity to carry out that campaign promise. However, we are now finding that our reorganization bill has the same faults and defects as the 1939 and the 1945 reorganization bills—meaning that our pet agencies and bureaus are excluded from the provisions of this bill just as they have been excluded by former bills introduced for the same purpose. Of course, the Expenditures Committee uses more technical language and advises us that these four privileged agencies are not excluded, but explains that these four pets just do not come under the same kind of set-up. At the same time, we know that when these four particular privileged pets are allowed to come under the provisions of subsection (b), they are not to be treated as these other agencies of the Government under the reorganization plan; and, therefore, it can well be expected that there will be no reorganization of the, first, National Military Establishment; second, Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System; third, Interstate Commerce Commission; and, fourth, Securities and Exchange Commission.

Now, if I had a pet to be excluded from the provisions of this bill by being placed along with the four agencies under section 5 (b), it would be the choice of a majority of us—the civil engineers. This would be my pet because the civil engineers have petted the people of my country more than the other agencies. However, I can assure you that I have no Government-agency pets to be considered foremost to the people I represent.

It is my opinion that if we want to reorganize our Federal agencies, attempt to save money for the taxpayers of this country, and reduce the number of employees that we have on the payroll who are doing nothing more than drawing pay, we should make a straightforward attempt to do so at this time. All of us realize that there is nothing more permanent in Washington than temporary employment with the United States Government. We get up on the political platforms throughout our sections of the country and each of us holler to the top of our voices, "If you will send me up there to replace that fellow who has been representing you in Congress, I can assure you that I will lower the cost of our Government." As an attempt to live up to our promises, we come forth with a reorganization plan that should cover all Federal agencies; I am at a loss to know how four Federal executive department agencies have managed to become excluded by that great committee of ours known as the Committee on Expenditures. A few minutes ago when someone offered an amendment for the purpose of adding his pet agency to be included in the exclusions, the chairman of that committee said:

Is this Congress going to pass a bill that will get the job done; or are we going to put in exclusions that will prohibit the President from having any power to reorganize the executive department of this Government?

My amendment adds no agencies to the list of exclusions that will cripple the efforts of the President and his administration to properly reorganize the executive agencies of our Government; but, to the contrary, this amendment, if adopted, will remove the four stumbling blocks that can only be classified as "privileged pets" of the Expenditures Committee with no more right to be excluded from the provisions of this bill than any other Federal agencies that we could mention.

Now, friends, if we want to vote for a reorganization plan, let us vote for it and not a subterfuge. You have a chance here now. By taking out subsection (b) of section 5, you will be treating every Federal agency just exactly alike.

I want to ask you: Why is the Securities and Exchange Commission left in here under subsection (b) as an exclusion to the provisions of this bill? Why is it excluded under subsection (b)? Is it more important than the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, or many other Federal agencies that we could mention, or is it just somebody's pet?

Why is the Interstate Commerce Commission excluded from the organization purpose of this bill by being placed as a privileged agency under subsection (b)? This is the first time that I ever knew that organization had any political friends, but I can readily see that it has some friends somewhere on the Expenditures Committee.

Of course, it is not hard to see why the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System is listed among the privileged few because that all-powerful organization spreads its politics throughout the Nation.

The National Military Establishment is excluded as a privileged agency, I presume, under the theory that someone might be criticized by some person back home who might think we were trying to hurt his organization.

All Federal agencies, including the Military Establishments, could stand some reorganization, if the voters and taxpayers are to be considered. The hiring of civilian employees in the Military Establishments is now and has been during the past 12 months increasing more than 166 persons per day. Exclusive of Military Establishments, the daily average increase for the Federal civilian agencies during the same time is 131—a total of 297 new Federal employees each day the sun rises.

Mr. Chairman, it is known by all, regardless of party affiliations, the ever-present need for making the changes suggested by this bill in the reorganization of the executive agencies of the Government, hopeful of limiting expenditures to the lowest amount consistent with the efficient performance of essential services, activities, and functions, but more than anything else, eliminating a duplication and overlapping of services, activities, and functions. Such need is not exclusive to all Federal agencies except four privileged ones—but is needed as much so in one agency as the other. If an agency be perfect, needing no reorganization, why would that particular agency fear being scrutinized by the reorganization commission?

Mr. Chairman, it does not take debate on this amendment issue. If you actually want to curtail expenditures of the Federal Government, which the Republicans have gone out and declared the Democrats were not attempting to do; and if the Democrats want to retaliate with some sound action and bring about a saving of needless Federal expenditures, we have a chance to do it now. If we merely want to appease the people with a camouflage, then vote against my amendment. After viewing the success of other efforts to amend this piece of proposed legislation, I do not expect you to pass the amendment anyhow because I see that the Expenditures Committee is certainly running the show here now.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TACKETT) there were—ayes 58, noes 149.

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the bill be considered as read and that the bill be open to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON]?

There was no objection.

The remainder of the bill is as follows:

TAKING EFFECT OF REORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 6. (a) Except as may be otherwise provided pursuant to subsection (c) of this section, the provisions of the reorganization plan shall take effect upon the expiration of the first period of 60 calendar days, of continuous session of the Congress, following the date on which the plan is transmitted to it; but only if, between the date of transmittal and the expiration of such 60-day period there has not been passed by the two Houses a concurrent resolution stating in substance that the Congress does not favor the reorganization plan.

(b) For the purposes of subsection (a)—

(1) continuity of session shall be considered as broken only by an adjournment of the Congress sine die; but

(2) in the computation of the 60-day period there shall be exluded the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than 3 days to a day certain; except that if a resolution (as defined in section 202) with respect to such reorganization plan has been passed by one House and sent to the other, no exclusion under this paragraph shall be made by reason of adjournments of the first House taken thereafter.

(c) Any provision of the plan may, under provisions contained in the plan, be made operative at a time later than the date on which the plan shall otherwise take effect.

DEFINITION OF AGENCY

SEC. 7. When used in this act, the term "agency" means any executive department, commission, council, independent establishment, Government corporation, board, bureau, division, service, office, officer, authority, administration or other establishment, in the executive branch of the Government, and means also any and all parts of the municipal government of the District of Columbia except the courts thereof. Such term does not include the Comptroller General of the United States or the General Accounting Office, which are a part of the legislative branch of the Government.

MATTERS DEEMED TO BE REORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 8. For the purposes of this act, the term "reorganization" means any transfer, consolidation, coordination, authorization, or abolition, referred to in section 3.

SAVING PROVISIONS

SEC. 9. (a) (1) Any statute enacted, and any regulation or other action made, prescribed, issued, granted, or performed in respect of or by any agency or function affected by a reorganization under the provisions of this act, before the effective date of such reorganization, shall, except to the extent rescinded, modified, superseded, or made inapplicable by or under authority of law or by the abolition of a function, have the same effect as if such reorganization had not been made; but where any such statute, regulation, or other action has vested the function in the agency from which it is removed under the plan, such function shall, insofar as it is to be exercised after the plan becomes effective, be considered as vested in the agency under which the function is placed by the plan.

(2) As used in paragraph (1) of this subsection the term "regulation or other action" means any regulation, rule, order, policy, determination, directive, authorization, permit, privilege, requirement, designation, or other action.

(b) No suit, action, or other proceeding lawfully commenced by or against the head of any agency or other officer of the United States, in his official capacity or in relation to the discharge of his official duties, shall abate by reason of the taking effect of any reorganization plan under the provisions of this act, but the court may, on motion or supplemental petition filed at any time within 12 months after such reorganization plan takes effect, showing a necessity for a survival of such suit, action, or other proceeding to obtain a settlement of the questions involved, allow the same to be maintained by or against the successor of such head or officer under the reorganization effected by such plan or, if there be no such successor, against such agency or officer as the President shall designate.

UNEXPENDED APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 10. The appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by reason of the operation of this act shall not be used for any purpose, but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury.

PRINTING OF REORGANIZATION PLANS

SEC. 11. Each reorganization plan which shall take effect shall be printed in the Statutes at Large in the same volume as the public laws, and shall be printed in the Federal Register.

TITLE II

SEC. 201. The following sections of this title are enacted by the Congress:

(a) As an exercise of the rule-making power of the Senate and the House of Representatives, respectively, and as such they shall be considered as part of the rules of each House, respectively, but applicable only with respect to the procedure to be followed in such House in the case of resolutions (as defined in section 202); and such rules shall supersede other rules only to the extent that they are inconsistent therewith; and

(b) With full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change such rules (so far relating to the procedure in such House) at any time, in the same manner and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of such House.

SEC. 202. As used in this title, the term "resolution" means only a concurrent resolution of the two Houses of Congress, the matter after the resolving clause of which is as follows: "That the Congress does not favor the reorganization plan numbered —— transmitted to Congress by the President on ————, 19—.", the blank spaces therein being appropriately filled; and does not include a concurrent resolution which specifies more than one reorganization plan.

SEC. 203. A resolution with respect to a reorganization plan shall be referred to a committee (and all resolutions with respect to the same plan shall be referred to the same committee) by the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Representatives, as the case may be.

SEC. 204. (a) If the committee to which has been referred a resolution with respect to a reorganization plan has not reported it before the expiration of 10 calendar days after its introduction (or, in the case of a resolution received from the other House, 10 calendar days after its receipt), it shall then (but not before) be in order to move either to discharge the committee from further consideration of such resolution, or to discharge the committee from further consideration of any other resolution with respect to such reorganization plan which has been referred to the committee.

(b) Such motion may be made only by a person favoring the resolution, shall be highly privileged (except that it may not be made after the committee has reported a resolution with respect to the same reorganization plan), and debate thereon shall be limited to not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing the resolution. No amendment to such motion shall be in order, and it shall not be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which such motion is agreed to or disagreed to.

(c) If the motion to discharge is agreed to or disagreed to, such motion may not be renewed, nor may another motion to discharge the committee be made with respect to any other resolution with respect to the same reorganization plan.

SEC. 205. (a) When the committee has reported, or has been discharged from further consideration of, a resolution with respect to a reorganization plan, it shall at any time thereafter be in order (even though a previous motion to the same effect has been disagreed to) to move to proceed to the consideration of such resolution. Such motion shall be highly privileged and shall not be debatable. No amendment to such motion shall be in order and it shall not be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which such motion is agreed to or disagreed to.

(b) Debate on the resolution shall be limited to not to exceed 10 hours, which shall be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing the resolution. A motion further to limit debate shall not be debatable. No amendment to, or motion to recommit, the resolution shall be in order, and it shall not be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution is agreed to or disagreed to.

SEC. 206. (a) All motions to postpone, made with respect to the discharge from committee, or the consideration of, a resolution with respect to a reorganization plan, and all motions to proceed to the consideration of other business, shall be decided without debate.

(b) All appeals from the decisions of the Chair relating to the application of the rules of the Senate or the House of Representatives, as the case may be, to the procedure relating to a resolution with respect to a reorganization plan shall be decided without debate.

SEC. 207. If, prior to the passage by one House of a resolution of that House with respect to a reorganization plan, such House receives from the other House a resolution with respect to the same plan, then—

(a) If no resolution of the first House with respect to such plan has been referred to committee, no other resolution with respect to the same plan may be reported or (despite the provisions of sec. 204 (a)) be made the subject of a motion to discharge.

(b) If a resolution of the first House with respect to such plan has been referred to committee—

(1) the procedure with respect to that or other resolutions of such House with respect to such plan which have been referred to committee shall be the same as if no resolution from the other House with respect to such plan had been received; but

(2) on any vote on final passage of a resolution of the first House with respect to such plan the resolution from the other House with respect to such plan shall be automatically substituted for the resolution of the first House.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan:

On page 8, line 5 strike out the words "the two Houses a concurrent" and insert in lieu thereof "either House a."

On line 6, strike out the words "the Congress" and insert in lieu thereof, the word "it."

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, even at my age, there is no law against indulging in what might be termed a little flirtation if it be harmless. I have been listening to what might be termed either the orders, the blandishments, or the advice of some Members who, I hope, are my friends, and who sit to my right. They found some fault with the broader amendment which I proposed to offer and they persuaded me—or at least I am doing it—to offer this amendment. All this amendment does is to preserve half of the Congressional power to legislate. All it requires is that when the President sends a plan here it will not become the law of the land if either House of the Congress puts through a resolution disapproving it, saying that it does not approve of the plan. I hope my friends on the Democratic side of the aisle have not led me astray and that they are not going to leave me out on a limb.

I hope—I would almost say I pray—that they will remember the words of advice which they have been giving me during the past week and again today when some suggested that this amendment would probably go through the House and that the prerogatives of the House would be preserved and that the duty of the House to legislate would still rest upon us to act on a plan within a certain time after the President sent it to us.

I hope—oh, I hope—that I have not been deceived, gentlemen. I hope you are going to go along with me on this amendment.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. VORYS. As I understand it, the gentleman's amendment merely provides that any reorganization plan goes through unless the House votes that it should not go through.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. And the same thing applies to the Senate.

Mr. VORYS. That is it, is it not?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. VORYS. That is all it provides. It leaves it to the House, and the reorganization plan will go through unless the House says it should not.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is right.

Mr. VORYS. In that way the Members who have been fearful concerning favored organizations will have their chance if their organization is to be damaged to have their say before the House and we can thus preserve the responsibility of the House in legislation.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is right. If the friends of the Engineers or of any other group think that something is going to be done to their pet, if you want to describe it that way, or if you want to express it more accurately, if something is going to be done which they think should not be done, then the House can vote it down. It can just say, "We do not approve of that legislation."

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. In the absence of this amendment, any plan proposed by the President, approved by the Senate, or a plan in respect to which the Senate took no action whatever, would become the law of the land, even if every Member of this body were opposed to it?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is right. The House might vote unanimously to reject a plan and yet unless this amendment goes through it would be the law of the land if the other body did not act.

I am just asking for half a loaf, and for the support of those who advised me to take this course.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to tell a story that I think will illustrate the point that this amendment simply ruins the effectiveness of this bill.

A certain colored man down in Georgia had caught a large channel catfish. Let me say to you that unless you have eaten a channel cat, freshly caught and fried in deep fat, and unless you have had some hushpuppies to go along with it, you do not know what real eating is. Well, this colored gentleman had caught a big catfish and he was trying to skin that catfish. The catfish was floundering around, and finally finned him. The colored man said, "Catfish, what are you trying to do?" He said, "Quit that floppin' around." He said, "I ain't trying to do a thing but gut you."

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is not trying to do a thing but gut this bill.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Of course, after he guts the catfish nobody is going to eat it.

Mr. LANHAM. Now, my friend the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN], asked me in the debate earlier in the day why it was that Congress itself could not reorganize the executive agencies of the Government, and he agreed with me that I was right when I said that these executive agencies and their friends gang up on them. Now, you are making it possible for them to gang up now, and they will not have to fool with us in the House at all. They will simply gang up over in the Senate where there are only 96 men to try to influence, and they will give us the go-by sure enough.

If you want to hinder reorganization, if you want to block it and stop it, although you say you are for it, then you should vote for this amendment.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. In my opinion, irrespective of the fact that the gentleman from Michigan has offered his amendment in good faith, in my opinion the adoption of this amendment for all practical purposes, would mean the ineffective operation of any reorganization bill. This amendment was very seriously considered in the committee. Furthermore, the last reorganization bill carried substantially the same provision as is contained in this bill. Agreeing with my friend in his unique story about gutting the catfish, this amendment, while not intended as such, will bring about the result that this bill will be gutted. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. LANHAM. It will be gutted just the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANHAM] has expired.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in this amendment we are faced with the real question of whether or not we want to continue the long-standing and tested legislative procedure, whereby no action under the authority of Congress is taken without the approval of both Houses of the Congress. Nothing else ever becomes law or goes into effect unless both Houses of Congress approve. Why should a reorganization plan? A hundred bills a year are passed by this House which are not adopted by the other body, and, of course, they do not become law. The same is true of bills passed by the other body but not by us. But under this bill as it now stands the President and one House of Congress can legislate, even though the other House expressly disapproves. It seems to me that as a matter of principle that is an extremely unwise thing to do. I do not believe any piece of legislation ought to be put into effect if one House disapproves. Do you? Does anybody really want a piece of legislation to go through that one House of Congress is opposed to?

Under this amendment the President sends down his bill with a plan for reorganization. After 60 days it automatically goes into effect unless one House passes a resolution disapproving. If one House passes such a resolution, that does not kill the plan; it merely returns it to the President for him to make such modifications as will remove our objections. The debates here will tell him what part of the plan we do not like. He revises it and sends it back to us. It is precisely like the way we handle a conference report. If we do not like any part of a conference report, we reject it and it goes back to conference; the conferees revise it and bring it back until we can let it become law.

Three years ago, when I was privileged to be a member of this great Committee on Expenditures, I offered this same amendment in the last Reorganization Act, and it came within 14 votes of winning. It came up late in the session, later even than today, and we did not have a chance to explain it fully. I do not see how anybody can rightly object to this when he understands it. Surely we do not want to delegate to one House of Congress and the President the power to enact laws.

Under this legislation we do not authorize the President to reorganize; we authorize him to prepare a plan of reorganization. He is in better position than we to prepare a plan. We want the President to take the lead—he has to—in suggesting specific reorganization steps. But reorganization is a legislative function and therefore our responsibility. We cannot rightly delegate to somebody else that responsibility without having a chance to look at it and have the final say before he can issue orders to put it into effect. Under the amendment, if either body for whatever reason seems to it adequate decides to pass a resolution within 60 days disapproving the particular plan the President has submitted, it goes back to him, he reworks it, brings it back in better form and it goes through.

The amendment cannot possibly gut the bill. It merely sticks to the basic system of government that we have had in this Republic for more than a hundred and fifty years whereby the two Houses of Congress and the President legislate, not the President and one House of Congress. What is wrong with that?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUDD. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. If the amendment is not adopted it means, does it not, in effect that one House of Congress and the President alone can legislate without the other House?

Mr. JUDD. Precisely; and that is exactly what I believe ought not to be done. If I felt sure the President would always send us what I personally would regard as the best reorganization plans ever devised, I still would be opposed to a system where the House could not hold it up if a majority should think it unwise.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time this particular amendment has been presented to the House, when a reorganization plan was proposed. This language which we have in the pending bill is the same language that was passed in the 1939 Reorganization Act and the 1945 Reorganization Act. Now, I am going back further, to the act of 1932, when Mr. Hoover was the President and his Attorney General was William B. Mitchell. In discussing this particular amendment which has been offered here today, it said:

If either branch of the Congress within such 60 calendar days shall pass a resolution disapproving of such Executive order or any part thereof, such Executive order shall become null and void to the extent of such disapproval.

In discussing that particular amendment, he said:

It must be assumed that the functions of the President under this act were Executive in their nature or they could not have been constitutionally conferred upon him; and so there was set up a method by which one house of Congress might disapprove Executive action. No one would question the power of Congress to provide for delay in the execution of such an administrative order, or its power to withdraw the authority to make that order provided the withdrawal takes the form of legislation. But to attempt to give either house of Congress by action which is not legislative power to disapprove administrative acts raises a grave question as to the validity of the entire provision in the act of June 30, 1932, for executive reorganization of the governmental functions.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield.

Mr. JUDD. But the situation he was describing was not at all comparable to the one we are discussing. He ruled that it was probably unconstitutional for one house of Congress to make null and void an Executive order issued by the President, and I agree. But this bill does permit Congress to nullify Executive orders, it does not in the first instance authorize the President to issue orders effecting reorganization and then submit the orders to Congress for approval or disapproval. It authorizes him to prepare a plan and submit that to Congress. He will have issued no orders. We will merely be enacting or not enacting into law the plan he submits. Only after 60 days have gone by without disapproval of the plan by the Congress does the plan become law and he have authority to issue Executive orders. We debated that when reorganization was under consideration in 1945, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Sumners, the eminent jurist who was chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, said the two situations were not alike. He said:

Attorney General Mitchell rendered an opinion that an Executive order made under the grant of legislative power could not be vacated or set aside by any congressional action short of legislation. It is perfectly apparent to the Membership of the House that this bill was drawn with the view of naming the President as the ministerial agent of the House rather than vesting in him legislative power, and therefore the provision contained in this bill whereby Congress may vacate any action taken by the President by concurrent resolution is perfectly valid, because it is a condition subsequent and is a part of the law itself.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I realize the gentleman's position and he has had 5 minutes to sustain it.

Mr. JUDD. But the situations are not similar.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. There is some question as to the constitutionality of the amendment which has been offered. The House by its action today will confer upon the President certain powers, delegating him to do certain things within limits. No one has attacked the constitutionality of that. Likewise when the plan comes back to the Congress the action of two Houses in disapproving it is just as important as the action of two Houses in approving. The gentleman's amendment does exactly what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANHAM] said, in my opinion. You know, you can always get one side of the Congress to agree for certain reasons to obstruct an act.

Mr. JUDD. Does the gentleman believe it is wise for legislation to be passed that one House of Congress disapproves?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. That one House of Congress disapproves?

Mr. JUDD. Yes; the amendment provides that the President will be empowered to carry out the plan and to issue directives and orders under the plan only if within 60 days neither House has disapproved. If neither House has disapproved, it goes on its way. If one House disapproves within 60 days he has to take the plan back.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. You are conferring upon one House legislative functions in fact.

Mr. JUDD. No; we are preventing one House alone from exercising legislative functions.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Under the bill presented by the committee it requires the action of both Houses to disapprove.

Mr. JUDD. That is true. But many of us believe we should stick to the basic system in our Constitution under which action can be taken under the authority of the Congress only if both Houses approve—that is, if neither disapproves. Let me read you what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] said when this was before us previously:

If it is within the competency of Congress to provide for vacating a plan that might be submitted under the bill by the President, by a concurrent resolution; it is of course equally within the right of Congress to provide that the order might be vacated by a simple resolution of either body.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Committee of the Whole stand behind the committee on this and vote down the amendment as it will nullify the whole act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to tell my colleagues a little story, about an occasion that happened, I think in 1940, in connection with what was then Reorganization Plan No. 3. That reorganization plan, among other things, abolished what was known as the Air Safety Board. Very shortly thereafter occurred a series of air accidents, something like 28 or 30 in number. In the course of that time the House appointed what was known as the Select Committee of the House of Representatives to Investigate Air Accidents. I believe I am the only Member of the House today who was a member of that select committee. The accident near Atlanta, Ga., in which our own beloved colleague and friend, Bill Byron, of Maryland, was killed, and Capt. Eddie Rickenbacher seriously injured, pointed the need for a congressional investigation.

We proceeded to investigate 28 air accidents. It was considered at first by that committee, and I concurred in the thought, that abolition of the Air Safety Board had nothing to do with the accidents, but the further we went into it the more we became convinced that its abolition did have something to do with it. I bring that up only for one reason. When that reorganization plan was brought before the House of Representatives, the House by a very substantial majority voted its disapproval of that plan. I cannot now just remember whether the Senate did not concur with the House or whether no action whatever was taken in the other body. But, at all events, with the complete disapproval of the House, that plan nevertheless became law. Since then we have tried to arrive at some reasonable conclusion in our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that would provide for a new Air Safety Board. The difficulties have been great. Perhaps, administratively, it is now being corrected. I trust it is. But, there was one serious instance when the House of Representatives by a considerable majority disapproved of a Presidential plan for reorganization largely because of the abolition of the Air Safety Board, and it became law nevertheless. We believed in our select committee unanimously that the Air Safety Board should not have been abolished. We could not do a thing about it in the House, because while we had disapproved its abolition, the plan nevertheless became law.

It seems to me that the House of Representatives is capable of judging the rightness or the wrongness of any plan for reorganization just as well as any other body in the Congress, and I think for myself that we should retain here the right to approve or disapprove any of those plans, regardless of any other agency of the Government. I think if we do not do that, that we will be giving away a very important part of our rights as representatives of the people of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I support the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JUDD) there were—ayes 95, noes 142.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee may return to page 6 of the bill in order that I may offer a correcting amendment which is not at all hostile to the purposes of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WADSWORTH: On page 6, line 1, after the word "for" strike out the words "winding up" and insert the word "terminating."

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, the committee accepts the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment. Since debate will undoubtedly not change any votes, I ask for a vote on the amendment upon the conclusion of its reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan: On page 8, in line 3 of subsection (c) of section 6, after the semicolon following the word "it", strike out the words "but only if" and insert in lieu thereof the words "provided that" and in line 5, strike out the word "not" and in line 6 strike out the word "not." In line 7 after the word "plan" strike out the period, insert a semicolon and add the following words, "provided further that the Congress shall, within such 60-day period, either approve or disapprove of such reorganization plan."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARRIS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2361) to provide for the reorganization of Government agencies, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments with instructions to report the bill back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: On page 8, after the word "by" strike out the words "the two Houses a concurrent" and insert the words "either House a"; and in line 6 strike out the words "the Congress" and insert the word "it."

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 358, nays 9, not voting 66, as follows:

CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, let us no longer tolerate the bestial, uncivilized conduct of the Soviets and their puppets. We cannot afford longer to appease and temporize with palpable conspiracies against this Nation and the cause of human freedom everywhere.

Shall no voice of protest be raised by this Government against this latest outrage against Christianity and democracy? We should officially protest this persecution, this unspeakable cruelty. If protests are unheeded, we should promptly withdraw diplomatic recognition. The time has come to act in defense of our freedoms and security.

The resolution was agreed to.

AMERICAN AGRICULTURE

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, American agriculture needs a slightly different gearing toward better adjustment, but let us not strip the gears in the process. We must decide on an approach that will not ignore such important things as national economic security, the conservation of our agricultural resources and keeping them intact for any eventuality, and the social well-being of every American.

I shall from time to time point out some of the hazards of the present law governing price supports on basic farm crops. We should not become complacent after removing certain features of this legislation, such as the provision that permits support of basic farm prices at less than 90 percent of parity after January 1, 1950. That is only the beginning. Following that, we must provide a program that will help and encourage and be an incentive to the farmer to carry on genuine soil conservation practices, to adjust his production so that we can have high production, high agricultural income, along with protection against excessive imports to insure a high national standard of living, and a secure national economy.

We need the continuance of a 90-percent parity price support, especially on basic farm crops, to provide an incentive for the farmer to produce. But at the same time, we must provide the farmer the right kind of assistance so that he can make the needed adjustments for continued fuller balanced production but which will not necessitate huge expenditures to support prices.

With that in view, I have today introduced a bill which I am confident will provide the framework to do this, legislation which will direct the United States Department of Agriculture to move ahead in the only sane way there is to help the farmer solve these problems. This legislation does not provide for reduced production, but rather for a better balance of production.

It provides for the farmer to receive technical and financial assistance so that he can convert his poorer, now uneconomic producing land to a safe, long-time economic production use. He will be able to increase the fertility of his land so that he can produce more and better crops at cheaper cost, and at the same time give his land the protection it needs for maximum conservation and profitable continued production.

This legislation does not call for new agencies. It provides for the Secretary of Agriculture to use the same agencies, namely, Soil Conservation Service, Extension Service, and PMA, and also enables him to direct such manpower for more concerted action in soil conservation and for balanced farm production.

What will it cost the taxpayer? Definitely not one cent more than is now being appropriated. In all probability in due time it will cost less than is now being appropriated for benefits to agriculture and in addition will save untold millions we will need otherwise to support farm prices. This legislation provides that the money being appropriated for agricultural conservation payments—between two hundred and fifty to three hundred million dollars a year—be used for genuine conservation and balanced production purposes.

Let us glance momentarily at some of the beneficial adjustments these payments could bring about. Farmers are now growing about 11,000,000 more acres of wheat than they did on an average from 1937 to 1946. Half of this increased acreage was made possible by using land which previous to that was in grass, and should go back to grass. The other half was made possible by using land which formerly was used for hay, and moisture conserving practices. At the same time, livestock numbers have gone down. We have 11,000,000 fewer head of sheep than we did in 1942. We have 5,000,000 fewer head of beef cattle. This does not account for the livestock losses occurring from the recent subzero weather and blizzard conditions which have attacked our western cattle country in the past few weeks. These are just two items in our maladjusted agriculture. We today have 5,000,000 more acres of soybeans than we had in the 1930's, more acreage in cotton, corn, and other basic crops—and all at the sacrifice of either our soil resources or other production. Is it any wonder we have an erosion problem and an unbalanced agriculture? And these are but a very few of the out-of-adjustment crops we are confronted with.

This needed adjustment could be brought about by an expenditure of but one-third of present conservation payments—or approximately $100,000,000 a year, leaving the rest of these funds to serve additionally for conserving our soil resources and rebuilding the productivity of the rest of our land for any eventuality and making full economic use of every acre, whether it be for crops, livestock, fruit, or timber.

In brief, this legislation also provides for the joining together for a unified purpose the conservation work now being done by certain agencies of the United States Department of Agriculture—a recommendation being made by all persons who have investigated present conditions and understand the erosion and production problems in agriculture. This bill ties together the conservation payments of the Production and Marketing Administration and the excellent technical services being offered by the Soil Conservation Service to farmers in soil conservation districts embracing over three-fourths of our farmland. Furthermore, this legislation strengthens the necessary and proper approach by helping farmers work out their own farm problems through their soil conservation districts which are organized by farmers themselves under State law. The district activities are supervised by locally elected farmers. The Federal Government does not spend anything for salaries or expenses of these supervisors. Where such financial help is given directly to districts, it is being done by the various States in cooperation with this phase of our national conservation efforts.

All of us know that on a large share of our land its long-time economic and safe use demands carefully planned rotations. Bypassing these rotations is one of the chief contributors to today's agricultural maladjustment.

The 1945 census shows that about 403,000,000 acres of land was being cultivated annually. In addition, the census reported that there are about 47,500,000 acres of plowable pasture making a total of about 450,000,000 acres currently classified as cropland. According to our best authorities in agriculture, about 61,000,000 acres of this land are not suitable for cultivation. This land is now being bled of its fertility and topsoil and land we must save for a type of production which will not destroy it.

Of the total acreage now or potentially available for safe cropping in the United States—approximately 460,000,000 acres when certain conversions are made—around 25 percent is now being damaged at a rapid rate of erosion. On another 110,000,000 to 120,000,000 acres of cropland, erosion is proceeding at a less rapid but still serious rate.

If we allow this land destruction to continue for another 25 years at its present rapid pace, continue present rate of increase in population, how strong will we be agriculturally by 1975? Obviously, we will be much weaker. What if we are again faced with a world conflict at that time and are called on to feed ourselves and our allies? If an overflowing arsenal of food is as important at that time as it was in World Wars I and II, we will definitely fail unless we take more aggressive action to stop the loss of our irreplaceable soil resources.

In view of all of these factors, I consider that for a logical approach to this problem of helping farmers balance their production we must begin with the proper use and conservation of our soil and water resources. Using the facilities we already have in the Department of Agriculture, and making full use of the incentive program of conservation payments, in the legislation which I am introducing, I request that in addition to the needed basic national land policy which most of us have discussed before and favor, the following be enacted:

That the funds appropriated for conservation payments be divided into three groups of payments.

First. That there be class A payments to be used to encourage farmers to convert the use of land after it has been in grain, row, or other soil-depleting crops two or more previous years. These payments shall be used to help the farmers convert this land, for a reasonable time, to non-soil-depleting uses such as meadow, hay, pasture, and woodland. This conversion will encourage the production of more livestock and less grain but will not reduce the farmers' income. At the same time, it will encourage better land use, help to reduce erosion, and will greatly help to rebuild the fertility of our priceless soils. The payment shall be largest on the first year of conversion and on a reduced basis for the succeeding 5 years.

Second. That there be class B payments which shall be made for practices and other improvements of a permanent or semipermanent nature, such as terrace systems, drainage and irrigation installations, retirement of eroded cropland, farm ponds, range water diversion systems, and for other practices as may be needed to prevent permanent loss to the productive capacity of the land.

After 1952, class A and B payments shall be made only when land conversion or when such practices or improvements are carried out as part of a complete farm or ranch conservation plan on the basis of a cooperative agreement between a soil conservation or other conservation district and the landowner or operator.

Third. That there be class C payments which shall be made for recurring practices that will retard depletion of soil fertility, such as liming, fertilizing, grass seeding, crop rotation, cover cropping, mulching, and prevention of stubble burning. Such payments shall be made annually.

In brief, the foregoing and following are the major features and basic consideration which have brought about the introduction of this legislation. By its enactment, we will—

1. Establish a national land policy which will provide as a basis for agriculture's balanced production the conservation and proper use of our agricultural resources.

2. Achieve success in adjusting agricultural production for a high standard of living.

3. Protect our agricultural and national economy against bankruptcy.

4. Recognize the interdependency between a productive agriculture and a productive industry for national prosperity.

5. Help farmers to achieve greater success in soil and water conservation which will contribute extensively toward the agricultural security of our Nation.

6. Give to the American farmer the type of assistance he wants and needs—technical help he cannot obtain otherwise—and make it available through his locally farmer organized and administered soil conservation district.

7. Enable the Secretary of Agriculture to obtain greater farmer and national benefits from conservation payment funds.

8. Bring about a new era in American agriculture, which will lead to a more productive agriculture and industry, and give a permanent insurance for the preservation of our form of government.

OBJECTORS' COMMITTEE ON THE DEMOCRATIC SIDE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce the appointment of the objectors' committee on the Democratic side. The distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TRIMBLE], the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DEANE], and the distinguished gentleman from Colorado [Mr. ASPINALL]. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TRIMBLE], being the ranking member, is chairman of the objectors' committee on the Democratic side.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. VURSELL] is recognized for 20 minutes.

FINANCIAL SOLVENCY OF THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, numerous references have been made to alleged mandates growing out of the recent election. I think an analysis of the issues and the vote clearly show that no specific mandate on legislation was voted by the people.

Mr. Speaker, there is, however, one continuing and compelling mandate and responsibility resting upon this Congress which demands highest priority over any so-called legislative mandates from the November election. That mandate placed imperative responsibility upon the members of this Congress to keep this country sound financially.

It far transcends the call for additional billions of dollars for new legislation by the pressure groups. If they were made to understand their requests for constant greater appropriations may jeopardize the financial solvency of this country, they would cease to exert such pressure.

The Communists within our gates are the only ones who want to wreck the Nation financially, destroy the value of all of our Government bonds, wreck the banks, insurance companies, and destroy the credit of the Nation which would bring about chaos and the triumph of communism in this country.

That mandate and responsibility, when this Government was formed, was written into the Constitution of the United States at Philadelphia in 1787 and was regarded as one of its most important provisions. It is still in there, and its importance has grown with age.

Mr. Speaker, the mandate I refer to placed upon the Congress, and not upon the Chief Executive, the responsibility and the sole power to levy taxes with which to finance our Government. That provision was so important it provided that all tax legislation should originate in the House of Representatives, the Members of which were regarded as being the representatives subject to the most immediate control of the people. Their terms of office were fixed at 2 years so that if they failed to properly represent the people, they could be turned out of office at the next election.

The members of the Constitutional Convention all regarded the taxing power of great importance to the financial solvency of the Government. Thomas Jefferson well defined the thinking of those who wrote the Constitution on this particular subject when he made the statement, "The power to tax is the power to destroy."

That immortal statement is as true today as the founders of our Constitution held it to be at that time. Our responsibility to maintain a sound fiscal policy in these chaotic times when we are carrying a national debt load of $252,000,000,000 should rest more heavily on the conscience of each Member of this Congress today than ever before.

Nothing is more important to the well-being of the people of this Nation and of the world today, than that this Congress, with the cooperation of the Chief Executive, see to it that this Nation is kept in a sound financial condition.

Fifteen billion dollars appropriated in this session of Congress for national defense, $6,000,000,000 for compensation and care of veterans, almost $2,000,000,000 for agriculture, billions for social security, and all of the $42,000,000,000 we are asked to appropriate will mean nothing unless we keep the Government sound financially. We must keep this Nation strong against any eventuality.

Mr. Speaker, Lenin, the founder of communism, 30 years ago proclaimed the philosophy that capitalistic forms of government would eventually spend themselves into financial bankruptcy and become an easy prey to communism. Stalin in recent years has predicted that the United States would spend itself into financial bankruptcy. They have been anxiously waiting for this to happen. The Communists in this country have the same fervent hope and expectation.

May I emphasize this point: The Members of this House who face legislation to constantly expand the cost of Government, not only have the responsibility, but they have the power, and it is their duty, to stop the enactment of unnecessary legislation which will add billions of dollars of expense to the cost of Government each session. They also have the power, and should use it, to greatly reduce the cost of Government. I hope, in this session, the Members of this Congress will rise to their responsibility and prevent every possible waste in Government. We should reduce appropriations, rather than increase them.

With the tremendous debt hanging over the people, and the possible threat of another war, it seems most unfortunate that the President has recommended to the Congress a volume of new legislation which, if enacted into law by this Congress, will add several billion dollars annually to the present debt load, and will increase as the programs are put into operation, billions of dollars each year. Some have estimated that the legislation recommended by the President will require possibly $10,000,000,000 additional each year in taxes. We cannot carry such an additional tax load.

The President has asked a direct tax raise of $4,000,000,000, plus about $2,000,000,000 more money for social security. His budget request for $42,000,000,000, if it can be held to that for the coming fiscal year, amounts to $283 for each man, woman, and child in America.

Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of the desirability of any of the requests for new legislation. Even though some of them may be justifiable and desirous, little if any legislation requested is absolutely necessary. Take, for example, proposed legislation for socialized medicine, federalized or socialized housing; great expansion and extension of river valley power developments; the spending of $500,000,000 to develop the St. Lawrence seaway; universal military training costing more billions; and many other projects. None of them are absolutely necessary at the present time. We grew to our present strength, fought and won the last war without any of them.

The Federal Government is being called upon for billions of dollars for grants-in-aid to States, when the State treasuries are generally in much sounder condition than is the Federal Government.

WHO IS THE GOVERNMENT?

One hundred and forty million people and their property make up the Federal Government. It consists of some 40,000,000 families. The Government is not some particular agency in Washington that is supposed to take care of the people and support them; the people support their Government with the $42,000,000,000 in taxes asked from them by the President for the coming year.

The Government should operate like a family. If the farmer is heavily in debt and has a Ford car for the family's use, his son may want him to buy him a new Cadillac; the wife and daughters might like to have a new piano, additional and more expensive electrical appliances and clothes. They do not have to have them, but it would be nice if they could. The conservative, sensible farmer will think of his debts that he must reduce, and he will refuse to be pressured into increasing his debts by a few thousand dollars more, but will take his surplus cash and reduce his debts or mortgage. The Congress must protect the Government in the same sensible way; we must not spend billions for things we can do without. We must reduce the national debt instead.

Mr. Speaker, the Government is in debt today as never before. Millions of our people have loaned the Government billions of dollars through their purchase of Government bonds. We need to reduce the debt and keep those bonds at par value. We cannot do it if we permit the many pressure groups to get their hands into the Federal Treasury and take more and more billions out of the Government. This thing has got to stop before it is too late; this Congress can and should stop it.

Unfortunately, the President promised too much in additional services and extra hand-outs to the people during the heat of the recent campaign. Nearly all of the promises made by the President are now being formulated into legislation which, of course, will keep his political campaign promises. If they are kept, some will benefit temporarily; yet, all of the people eventually will lose.

This Eighty-first Congress will have to decide whether it will enact into law a volume of new legislation recommended by the President which will add to the cost of government many billions of dollars annually for years to come, or whether it will adopt a policy of economy in government, refuse to enact any unnecessary legislation, cut the cost of government, and reduce the Federal debt by many billions of dollars annually. I believe a great majority of the people want us to embark upon a policy of economy, rather than to vote additional unnecessary billions which will make it necessary to increase taxes. We can well afford to wait until we are better able to pay for additional projects and services.

Mr. Speaker, it seems significant that the President in his message to the Eighty-first Congress put no emphasis on economy in Government. Instead he recommends a broad legislative program that able economists who have made a study of it claim will cost the Government over $100,000,000,000 within the next 10 years; that it will compel an increase in taxes of between 19 and 27 percent. They claim that it will increase taxes by 1950, if all legislation is approved, by $26,000,000,000, which added to the present $42,000,000,000 would make the annual tax load $68,000,000,000 for 1950.

The $42,000,000,000 budget for the coming year requested by the President will cost the taxpayers and residents of Illinois alone $3,300,000,000 for its share in the cost of the Federal Government. This will take from my State, seven times all property taxes collected for all State and county governments in Illinois in 1948. It will take from the taxpayers of Marion County, where I live, $14,358,000. This is nine times as much as the $1,788,000 paid in Marion County in 1948 to cover the cost of all schools, city, and county governments.

It will take from Saline County in my district $9,603,000 as that county's share of the $42,000,000,000 budget requested by the President. This is over nine times as much as the $1,001,000 paid in Saline County in 1948 to cover the cost of schools, city and county government. It will penalize all counties in my district in the same way.

The Eighty-first Congress has before it two great opportunities for service to the people. The first is to refuse to enact all proposed new legislation not absolutely necessary that will add extra billions to the cost of Government.

Its second opportunity is to reduce the cost of Government by $4,000,000,000 and to defeat any attempt to increase taxes.

Unemployment is increasing every day. This proposed new legislation to increase taxes is one of the major reasons for the increase in unemployment. Businessmen will not risk their capital, stay in business, and expand it when they are threatened with a constant increase of taxes by the Federal Government. A tax policy that chokes the rewards of enterprise will destroy our prosperity.

Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest services that could be rendered to the laboring people of the Nation, and to everyone, would be to drastically cut the cost of Government at the present time, and reduce, rather than increase, our taxes. In fact, excise taxes such as the 25 percent tax on telephone and telegraph communications, and dozens of such taxes on items that are not luxuries should be greatly reduced, or wiped out completely. We should be reducing taxes, rather than even considering raising tax rates.

This is certainly not the time to spend additional billions on new legislation. This is not the time to add 4 or 6 billion dollars additional taxes onto the taxpayers and the economy of our Government. If we do, we may prove that Jefferson was right when he said "the power to tax is the power to destroy." If we do, and pass additional new and unnecessary legislation that will cost many billions annually for the years to come, we may destroy the financial solvency of this Government to the great delight of Stalin, Molotov, and their Communist followers in our country.

This Congress, if it has the courage to stand up against the pressure groups and do the things they know within their own conscience is right, can cut the cost of Government and effect other economies by over $4,000,000,000.

Senator BYRD, of Virginia, has repeatedly called for a reduction of many thousands in Federal pay rolls. For the past 7 or 8 months, pay rolls have constantly increased. If we pass the legislation requested by the President, countless thousands of additional new pay-rollers will be added to the sprawling bureaucracy of this country. Their salaries will be a constant cost against the Government. Bureaucratic pay rolls should be reduced in this session of Congress by over 200,000 people at a saving of $600,000,000.

This is a time when the Congress, yes, and the Chief Executive ought to be calling for a reduction in spending, instead of calling for an increase in spending and taxes.

The Hoover Commission authorized by the Congress to make a thorough study and bring in recommendations for the reorganization of the executive department of Government in an effort to stop waste and overlapping of bureaus and greater efficiency and economy in government, will soon make its final report.

The Commission has given out several partial reports. Every report indicates that billions of dollars can be saved, and greater efficiency accomplished if the full report, soon to be made to the Congress, is adopted.

Instead of enacting a broad and expensive program of new legislation that will add countless thousands to this bureaucracy, why not wait till the next session of Congress until we have put the executive departments on an efficiency and economy basis, rather than add additional rooms and wings to the rambling bureaucratic structure we have today?

Comptroller General Lindsay C. Warren last week, in testifying before the House Executive Expenditures Committee in Washington, had this to say:

The Federal bureaucracy—

Now numbering over 2,000,000 persons—is a Frankenstein monster, and an ideal system for tax eaters—attached to the public teat.

Further he said:

Our present Federal set-up is a hodgepodge and crazy quilt of duplications, overlapping, inefficiencies, and inconsequences.

As I have testified before—

Stated Mr. Warren—

at times it (the bureaucracy) arrogantly snaps its fingers in the face of Congress and openly defies it.

This comes from the Comptroller General of the United States, incidentally a Democrat, who is the agent of the Congress and a part of the legislative branch of the Government.

We can cut billions out of this bureaucracy in salaries and waste, and I for one want to see the Congress move in that direction instead of increasing the taxes. The President's proposed new legislation will increase pay rolls and make more taxes necessary.

Mr. Speaker, every segment of the American people now in my opinion are carrying as heavy a tax load, from the humblest to the highest, as they should be compelled to carry. If this Congress follows the recommendation of the President to increase taxes in the higher brackets and on corporations, the little taxpayers and a part of the laboring crowd who approve such a policy, will find that they who earn and pay taxes on less than $5,000 a year will have to pay at least two-thirds of this extra $4,000,000,000 in taxes.

Big business is paying war times taxes now like all of the rest of us. When additional taxes are placed on business and the corporations, the cost of these taxes will be added to the cost of goods bought by the little fellows earning up to $5,000 a year.

The millions of small taxpayers will pay about 64 percent of the $42,000,000,000. This is true because there are so many more of them.

In addition to income taxes, they will continue to pay hundreds of hidden taxes that go into the cost of the clothes they wear, the houses they live in, or the food they eat, and never know the tax is being passed on to them in the price of merchandise after it is loaded on to business or the corporations in taxes by the Federal Government.

May I close my remarks by expressing the hope that the 435 Members in the House of Representatives will realize in this session of Congress, as never before, that they will serve their constituents best, and that they will serve themselves and the Nation best, if we will reduce Government spending and prevent an increase in taxes.

The national defense of this country depends on keeping the Nation in a sound financial condition. If we fail as a nation financially, we cannot defend ourselves against any foe from within or without.

We cannot fully discharge our duty unless we reduce spending and cut the cost of Government. The time to act is now. It is later than we think. It is the responsibility of the Eighty-first Congress. It is the greatest challenge before you and the people that can come to this Congress. It may well mean the protection of your freedom and liberty for the future, and the preservation of our representative form of Government.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LARCADE] is recognized for 30 minutes.

THE UNITED STATES RICE INDUSTRY

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include statements, statistical material, and other matter in relation to the rice industry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, last week the Members of Congress from the three southern rice-producing States—Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas—held a meeting with the officials of the Economic Adjustment Administration and the Department of Agriculture, and a statement was issued by those attending the meeting stating that in their opinion there was not too much cause for alarm in regard to the situation obtaining in the rice industry at this time.

The meeting was held largely to ascertain whether or not there was prospect of the Economic Adjustment Administration making purchase of approximately 1,000,000 pockets of rice from the United States under their allocation to China, and it was learned that because of the precarious situation existing as a result of the reverses of the nationalist government in China, these purchases have been deferred.

There are approximately 5,000,000 bags of rice of the 1948 crop in the hands of the growers and millers in the States of Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas. The Economic Adjustment Administration deferring the purchase of the allocation for China, and the fact that it is estimated that more than 50 percent of the remaining rice stocks in the States mentioned is of an inferior grade and poor milling quality, presents a major problem of distribution, and many of our growers and millers are becoming somewhat disturbed as to the sale of the remainder of the stock on hand, and while the world-wide demand for rice is in excess of the available supply at this time, the deferment of the purchase of rice for relief purposes in China by the Economic Adjustment Administration is deplored as the industry had anticipated the utilization of a large portion of the low grades in that program.

In previous years the Government has taken all of the low-grade rice and exported it on a price basis that would return to farmers approximately the same price that they received for the better grades; however, it must be borne in mind that conditions have changed and the Asiatic countries, which produced the major portion of the world supply prior to the war, were forced to reduce their production during the war to a point where the United States was called upon to expand their production in order to make up some of the deficit, and as a result of the scarcity of this product, prices for rice, like all other scarce commodities, increased in price comparable with prices prevailing during the First World War.

Other factors have now further changed the picture. Not only has the United States increased its production but a number of South American countries have expanded their production, and the Asiatic countries are now being rehabilitated, and they also are rapidly increasing their production, and from this time on the United States producers can look for a competitive market.

I think one of the best discussions of the situation in respect to commodity prices, including grains, hogs, and livestock is that by J. H. Carmical, in an article in the New York Times of Sunday, February 6, 1948, which I am quoting, as follows:

Under the weight of huge supplies, commodity prices—particularly domestic farm products—are going through their second readjustment in the postwar period. Coming just a year after the first price break, which was followed with only moderate and intermittent rallies, the present decline generally has wiped out the sharp rises in the immediate postwar period and has brought a number of commodities even below the level fixed by the Office of Price Administration during the war.

Despite the intervention of the United States Government with its price-support measures, the trend of commodity prices seems to be following those of every major war in the last two centuries. A sharp upward trend for a year or two until production again could get under way always has been followed by a sharp decline. Because of this Government's activities, including its aid program abroad, most people and especially the farmers had been led to believe that there would not be any sharp deflationary trend after World War II.

The huge supplies and prospects of large yields this year are among the factors in the present price trend. On January 1 last stocks of the six major grain crops in the United States were 1,372,600,000 bushels larger than a year earlier. When this was announced on January 25, it caused the grain trade to wonder if the Government's support program could remain effective in the face of another near-record yield this year.

Under the present Agricultural Act, the United States Government is committed to make nonrecourse loans to farmers at 90 percent of parity. Normally, the loan level would be the "floor" price on any farm product. However, with corn, and also wheat in recent months, dropping below the loan level, the trade realized that it was not safe to count on Government support prices as the absolute bottom.

STORAGE SPACE SCARCITY FELT

Among the reasons why prices have not held at the loan levels is the lack of storage space. This has caused some distress selling during the heavy marketing periods. In addition, many of the smaller farmers have sold their products in the open market rather than take the trouble involved in obtaining a Government loan. In some instances, the quality of a product is such that it will not qualify for a loan with the result that it is disposed of in the regular commercial way.

Another reason why support prices do not work in cases of abnormally large crops is that once a commodity has passed from the farmers' hands it enters the "free" supply and becomes subject to demand influences. Under the law the producer is the only person who may obtain a nonrecourse loan from the Government.

Probably the most important influence is the knowledge that there are excess supplies of all grains. The trade realizes that these ultimately will be made available, at least at loan redemption costs, and consumers are in no hurry to anticipate requirements very far in advance. Also, there is the further uncertainty as to when and at what price the Government will dispose of its loan holdings.

SUPPORT POLICIES A FACTOR

Further uncertainty involves the question of future farm price-support policies. The present support program of 90 percent of parity expires at the end of this year. Although a new plan providing for a sliding scale ranging from 60 to 90 percent of parity then is scheduled to apply, an effort is being made in Washington to set future price-support levels at a rigid 90 percent of parity. However, there are reports that some compromise arrangement may be worked out that would satisfy those of the farm bloc who are insisting on a rigid 90 percent loan level.

Despite all the efforts being made to hold farm-product prices and the billions of dollars that are being expended directly and indirectly for that purpose, the action of the grain markets over the past year indicates that it requires more than Government support to stem an economic trend.

In January 1948, May wheat in Chicago reached $3.06½ a bushel. In September, the May 1949 delivery sold at a low of $2.11⅜ when the post-harvest movement of wheat to terminals was at its height. Subsequently the price recovered moderately, but recently declined to around $2.15. However, July and September 1949 wheat have broken through the $2 level.

BREAK IN CORN SPECTACULAR

The break in corn price has been more spectacular. From a high in 1948 of $2.70¾ a bushel, May 1949 corn futures late in the year dropped to $1.39½. In the recent break, the price receded to around $1.27, or less than one-half of a year ago. The record corn crop last year and the heavy post-harvest movement to market have resulted in that cereal dropping sharply below its loan level of $1.56 a bushel at Chicago.

The heavy snows recently in the West, which have been accompanied by unseasonably low temperatures, have resulted in the deaths of a vast number of livestock, which will mean a lessened demand for corn for feeding purposes in the months ahead. In addition, the added moisture has improved the outlook for the present winter wheat crop.

For the first time since the end of the war, there are heavy surplus supplies of all important grains and the market simply is adjusting itself to the changed conditions. Had it not been for the support program, the decline probably would have been more drastic.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to quote a portion of an editorial from the Washington Post, also of date Sunday, February 6, 1948, entitled "Turn in the Tide" which also discusses prices for basic farm products, and which also states that the downward movement of commodity prices is no cause for alarm, as follows:

TURN IN THE TIDE

Government officials have been quick to point out that the current drop in employment and the downward movement of commodity prices is no cause for alarm. So far, certainly, there is nothing to worry about in the rise in unemployment, which, judged by prewar standards, is still at low levels. Prices for basic farm products have already undergone a sharp deflation that has been salutary rather than otherwise, while the much-advertised drop in retail prices has been extremely limited, bringing living cost indices only three points below the peak level reached a few months ago.

The prevailing uneasiness is due chiefly to a belief, supported by an abundance of confirmatory evidence, that the period of scarcity and consequent booming prices is coming to an end. That had to happen sometime and there is good reason to be thankful that it seems to be taking place while employment and consumer incomes are still at high levels. However, the shift from an economy characterized by scarcity to a more normal peacetime economy of comparative abundance in which the seller no longer has the upper hand entails some hazards. As backlog demands for durable goods are satisfied, for instance, some industries have to curtail their operations, others feel the effects of seasonal declines in buying that were once taken for granted, and marginal high-cost firms may be forced out of business by inability to market their products at profitable prices.

Many of our farmers do not realize that, in respect to rice, the United States normally produces approximately 1 percent of the world supply of this commodity, and, in this connection, I wish to submit a table showing the production of rough rice for the 1947–48 crop year from the Commodity Yearbook as follows:

|---|---|
| United States | 79,000,000 |
| India | 2,050,000,000 |
| Burma | 269,000,000 |
| China | 2,348,000,000 |
| Japan | 545,000,000 |
| French Indochina | 210,000,000 |
| Philippines | 109,000,000 |
| Korea | 129,000,000 |
| Java and Madura (1946–47) | 250,000,000 |
| Siam | 143,000,000 |
| Brazil | 111,000,000 |
| Estimated world total | 7,086,000,000 |

In addition to the countries included in the above and foregoing table, two other countries produced a large amount of rice. The figures given are for Mexico, which had a rough-rice production—1946–47—of 6,760,000 bushels; 1947–48, 7,300,000 bushels; 1948–49, estimated, 7,350,000 bushels. Guatemala produced in 1945, 544,000 bushels, and in 1948 produced 14,000 short tons.

Egypt and other countries are also increasing their production to a substantial degree. With these facts staring us in the face, it must be realized that we must evaluate the situation as it now confronts the United States rice industry.

With the end of the war and with changed world-wide conditions, while it is anticipated that the balance of the United States stocks of rice will be utilized at a price above the present parity price, we must realize that in the future, with increased production from the Asiatic and other countries, the United States industry will find itself in a competitive market, and it is a known fact that we cannot produce rice to sell in competition with the Asiatic countries whose standard of living and cost of production is so far below that of the United States. Therefore, the question arises, What is the future of the rice industry in the United States?

The consumption of rice in the United States is only about 50 percent of the amount of rice produced in the United States, and the United States is able to produce a better grade of rice than are our competitors—the long-grain variety. Our principal export customer is Cuba and Cuba prefers long-grain rice rather than the lower grades. Therefore, the answer is hypothetical. We must either increase domestic consumption or reduce our production and plant only the higher quality of rice which is preferred not only by Cuba but by our domestic market. We will be unable to compete in a competitive market against the Asiatic countries as stated before due to the cost of production in the United States, even on the lower grades. Even at this time, the Asiatic countries can deliver a ton of rice to Canton, China, for $190 per ton, whereas it costs $225 per ton for United States rice.

Another question also arises in connection with our opportunity to export rice—as well as many other commodities. That is, many of the countries which might prefer to buy our products are now impoverished and do not have the dollars with whch to buy. Notwithstanding all of this, in view of the information which we have from the Government officials and other informed sources, it is hoped that the United States industry will be able to dispose of the remaining stock of the 1948 rice crop at a price above the present parity price, as rice is selling in the present market at approximately 122 percent of parity, and there is not enough rice in sight to meet the world demand, and even though a major portion of the remaining crop is of a low and inferior quality, it is believed that customers will be found to buy and pay for the remainder of the 1948 crop on hand.

For the future some predict that it will be 2 or 3 years before Burma, Siam, and Indochina will be able to reach normal production; however, it is my opinion that those countries will increase production to such a degree by next year that this fact will affect the demand and sale of United States rice next year, and the only salvation for the United States industry is to curtail production of, and grow only the higher quality and best grades of rice this year and in the years to come. It has been proven that cattle can well and profitably be produced on rice lands, and since the same situation as respects competition does not exist in the cattle industry as will exist in the rice industry, it would seem a good idea for the rice farmers of the United States to hedge and play safe and reduce rice production and increase cattle production.

SENATE

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1949

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., Litt. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, hallowed be Thy name. In our wayward hearts Thou hast implanted a love for truth and beauty and goodness. May Thy truth make us free—free from pride and prejudice, and from all the ugly sins of disposition that do so easily beset us. May the lure of Thy beauty lift us above the mud and scum of mere things to the realm of the excellent and the lovely. In a deceitful world which offers its cheap and empty prizes, where each ounce of dross counts its ounce of gold, enrich us with those durable satisfactions of life, so that the multiplying years may not find us bankrupt in the things that matter most, the golden currency of faith and hope and love. We ask it in the Name that is above every name. Amen.

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming; to the Committee on Appropriations:

"Enrolled Joint Memorial 1

"Joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States of America to consider and pass legislation appropriating money to complete the building of the Eden Valley irrigation project

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Wyoming (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized as follows:

"Whereas the building of the Eden project would increase to double its present size this farming community; and

"Whereas the completion of this project would provide farm homes for some 80 new farmers, preference being given to veterans of the World War; and

"Whereas this increased acreage could contribute to the need of the agricultural products in a world already short; and

"Whereas this coal-mining community provides an excellent market for the products raised in Eden Valley, we at the present time being dependent for our milk supply on adjacent States and communities far distant, when Eden Valley has proven its suitability for dairying; and

"Whereas considerable sums have already been expended on this project which now lies idle; and

"Whereas because of existing conditions, that is, lack of drainage and the possible deterioration of the irrigation system should the Government withdraw its support therefrom, there is no agency which will make real-estate loans on property lying within the irrigation project; and

"Whereas, the Federal Land Bank of Omaha, because of conditions as aforesaid, suspended the making of all loans to anyone within the district in the year of 1937: now, therefore be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Wyoming (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America be, and is hereby, memorialized to appropriate money for the completion of said irrigation project; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to United States Senators JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY and LESTER C. HUNT, Congressman FRANK A. BARRETT and the Honorable Secretary of the Interior."

Approved, January 26, 1949.

LESTER C. HUNT, Governor.

A memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Appropriations:

"House Memorial 1

"House memorial to the President of the United States, Harry S. Truman; Senator James E. Murray, Senator Zales N. Ecton, Congressmen Mike Mansfield and Wesley D'Ewart; Senator Joseph C. O'Mahoney, chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands; Julius Krug, Secretary of the Interior; and Michael Straus, Commissioner of Reclamation; requesting the introduction and enactment into law of the necessary and proper legislation authorizing that sufficient appropriations be provided the Bureau of Reclamation for the immediate construction of Yellowtail Dam located in Big Horn County in southern Montana

"Whereas Yellowtail Dam site is located in Big Horn County, in southeastern Montana, and Yellowtail Dam will be constructed across the Big Horn River, about three-fourths of a mile above the mouth of Big Horn Canyon—35 miles southwest of Hardin, Mont.; and

"Whereas Big Horn Canyon is the passageway of the Big Horn River between the northern end of the Big Horn Mountains and the Pryor Mountains. For more than 50 miles Yellowtail Reservoir will lie within the rugged, inaccessible canyon, the steep walls of which tower hundreds of feet above the narrow and winding river bed, forming a natural damsite of unique splendor that will in future years provide Montana and Wyoming with one of the greatest lake-recreation areas in the Western Hemisphere; and

"Whereas the United States Bureau of Reclamation was authorized by section 9 of the Flood Control Act of 1944, as a part of the Missouri River Basin project, to prepare preliminary surveys and construction of Yellowtail Dam; and

"Whereas the Bureau of Reclamation has practically completed preconstruction work at the site of Yellowtail Dam. Design specifications for the Dam and power plant have been started. Surveys have been made of the irrigable area, and transmission line location, and plans are ready or completed for construction of access roads, construction camp and other essential base work necessary before actual construction is undertaken; and

"Whereas Yellowtail Dam is being designed to provide for irrigation, hydroelectric power production, flow control, silt retention, conservation of fish and wildlife, recreational development and other related beneficial uses of value to all mankind; and

"Whereas construction of Yellowtail Dam will make possible the irrigation of 45,000 acres of new land along the Big Horn River from the Big Horn Canyon to approximately 10 miles north of the city of Hardin, and supplemental irrigation water for large areas now inadequately served will be also provided. Because irrigation of lands along the Big Horn, Powder and Yellowstone Rivers is dependent upon pumping, a source of low cost power is prerequisite. Construction of Yellowtail power plant will make possible the irrigation of many proposed and desirable projects along these three valuable but presently little utilized rivers; and

"Whereas construction of Yellowtail Dam offers a priceless solution for the equitable interstate use of the waters of the Big Horn by the creation of the Yellowtail Reservoir on the Montana-Wyoming State line; and

"Whereas power generating facilities to be constructed at the Dam will have an installed capacity of at least 120,000 kilowatts, and will produce about 712,200,000 kilowatt-hours of electrical energy annually. The said power produced at Yellowtail Dam will be used for irrigation pumping, and will serve as a part of the Bureau of Reclamation's power system constructed to provide power for construction of other developments and to supply surplus power to principal load centers to permit its use by new and old industries and residents of the area; and

"Whereas the Big Horn River is the greatest silt offender in the entire Yellowstone River system. Retention of silt behind Yellowtail Dam will be of material benefit; and

"Whereas fish and wildlife resources will gain by the dam, fishing and hunting, as well as the many allied recreational opportunities that will follow, will be of immense value to Montana and Wyoming; and

"Whereas Yellowtail Dam as planned will be a concrete arch-type structure towering some 499 feet above the river bed, and will have a crest length of 1,480 feet, and will have a storage capacity of 1,366,000 acre-feet; and

"Whereas the construction of said Yellowtail Dam will attract new industries into southern Montana, and thereby be of great benefit to the entire State of Montana, as well as the entire Nation, by supplying cheap electricity for industrial and home use, and this postwar period is the time to develop such industries: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Montana, That the Congress of the United States of America be respectfully urged and requested to make sufficient funds available immediately for the construction of Yellowtail Dam in Big Horn County in southern Montana; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be submitted by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the presiding officers of both Houses of the National Congress—ALBEN BARKLEY and SAM RAYBURN, to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives in Washington, D. C., to the Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation, the Commissioner of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the Secretary of the Interior, the Governor of the State of Wyoming, and the presiding officers of both houses of the Wyoming State Legislature, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the States of Montana and Wyoming."

A resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of California; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"House Resolution 73

"Resolution memorializing the Federal Government to preserve the forests of sugar pine growing in Tuolumne County, Calif.

"Whereas hundreds of giant sugar pine trees of Tuolumne County have grown to great height and size, in the 500 or more years of their lives, and exist today only in the State of California and southern Oregon; and

"Whereas these beautiful and majestic monarchs of the forest that can never be replaced are threatened with complete destruction within the next few months at the hands of a midwest lumber company, notwithstanding that there is no valid commercial requirement for their cutting; and

"Whereas it is represented that the present financial condition of the government of the State of California may be used to delay fatally the immediate acquisition of this sublime forest as part of a great State park now proposed to be created as a permanent memorial to those who gave their lives for us in the World Wars: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the Assembly of the State of California, That these sugar pine forest areas ought, in spite of all obstacles, to be preserved for the enjoyment, pleasure, and cultural enrichment of the present generation and all posterity; and be it further

"Resolved, That the assembly, on behalf of the people of the State of California, hereby memorializes and urges the United States Government to take immediate action pursuant to title 16, section 494, United States Code, which statute grants to the United States Secretary of Agriculture full authority, at his discretion, to take possession of these forest lands by allowing the present private owners the right to select, in lieu thereof, within 60 days, other forest lands belonging to the United States Government; and be it further

"Resolved, That when this immediate and most feasible emergency action has been taken to preserve the forests from destruction by logging operations, that chapter 368, United States Statutes at Large, be amended to permit the State of California to acquire title to the sugar pine forest areas in Tuolumne County in addition to the 1,200 acres of land in this immediate vicinity already offered to the State of California for State park purposes; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly at once send copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States, and to the United States Secretary of Agriculture."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

"Assembly Joint Resolution 16

"Joint resolution relative to memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States in relation to the mooring of surplus vessels in the northern waters of San Francisco Bay and the waters connected therewith

"Whereas the United States has caused a large number of surplus vessels, both naval and merchant marine, to be moored in the waters of the northern part of San Francisco Bay and in waters connected therewith; and

"Whereas the presence of such surplus vessels in such waters seriously interferes with commercial fishing therein and creates a hazard to navigation, particularly the navigation of fishing vessels; and

"Whereas while it is recognized that it is necessary that these surplus vessels be moored at some suitable place, there is no apparent reason why they could not be moored at places where no interference with commercial fishing would result and where such vessels would not constitute any menace to navigation; and

"Whereas the difficulties and inconvenience caused by such mooring of surplus vessels is particularly acute in Suisun Bay, Broad slough, and the waters off Stake Point, and the removal of such vessels from such waters would eliminate a large part of the difficulties involved in this situation: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the President and the Congress of the United States are hereby requested to take such steps as may be necessary to cause the surplus vessels now moored in the northerly waters of San Francisco Bay and waters connected therewith, and particularly those vessels moored in Suisun Bay, Broad slough, and in the waters off of Stake Point, to be moved to some other mooring place where such vessels will not interfere with commercial fishing nor constitute a hazard to navigation; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly is directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives and President pro tempore of the Senate, each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California, the Secretary of the Navy and the Maritime Commission of the United States."

Three joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"Assembly Joint Resolution 2

"Joint resolution relative to memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States in relation to two irrigation canals to supply water from the Sacramento River to areas in northern California

"Whereas the great Central Valley of California consists of two connected valleys, the one to the north comprising the watershed of the Sacramento River and the one to the south comprising the watershed of the San Joaquin River; and

"Whereas the State water plan of California developed from a series of comprehensive investigations conducted principally in the decade following 1920 and envisioned, among other things, a plan for the transfer of large quantities of water from the northern area where water was plentiful to the southern area where it was acutely needed; and

"Whereas the Central Valley Project Act of 1933 had for one of its principal purposes such a large-scale transfer of water from the Sacramento Valley to the San Joaquin Valley; and

"Whereas the State water plan also envisioned the utilization of the water of the Sacramento River within the Sacramento Valley but the original Central Valley Project Act, while it provided that no watershed or area wherein water originates should be deprived of water required for its needs, nevertheless made practically no provision for the utilization of water within the Sacramento Valley; and

"Whereas, in 1941, the California Legislature recognized that the project should include some provision for the utilization of the water of the Sacramento River in the area in which it originates and added to the project two units, one called the Tehama-Colusa conduit, extending from the Sacramento River near Red Bluff through the counties of Tehama, Glenn, and Colusa west of the river, and the other, called the Tehama-Butte conduit, extending from a point near Red Bluff through the counties of Tehama, Butte, and Sutter east of the river; and

"Whereas the United States had theretofore taken over the Central Valley project as a Federal project and the two units have not been added to the project as now being constructed; and

"Whereas in the 1949 session of the Congress of the United States a bill introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressmen CLAIR ENGLE and HUBERT SCUDDER, of California, will be under consideration which provides for the inclusion in the Central Valley project of two new features, one called the Tehama-Colusa conduit and the other the Chico conduit; and

"Whereas the conduits provided for in the Engle-Scudder bill will effectuate the same general purposes as the two units above referred to which have already been added to the project as described in the California act; and

"Whereas the Engle-Scudder bill further safeguards the interests of the people of the area affected by requiring that the relevant documents of the State water plan be considered and that local interests affected be consulted; and

"Whereas the utilization of the water of the Sacramento River for the purposes contemplated will not affect or jeopardize any of the other features of the project but, on the contrary, will bring the project into closer conformity with the State water plan, and provide an additional water supply in areas where it is needed: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States to give favorable consideration to the Engle-Scudder bill hereinabove referred to, or to take whatever steps may be necessary to provide in such other manner as may be suitable for the construction of the same or similar conduits for the same or similar purposes; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly is directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States."

"Assembly Joint Resolution 10

"Joint resolution relative to memorializing the Congress of the United States in relation to the waters of the Colorado River

"Whereas more than 3,500,000 inhabitants of this State are dependent upon the Colorado River as a source of supplemental water supply for domestic purposes; and

"Whereas the metropolitan areas of southern California, including those within approximately 2,200 square miles of coastal plain and foothills extending from Los Angeles to Riverside and San Bernardino and those in San Diego and vicinity, are dependent upon the Colorado River as a source of supplemental water supply for municipal and industrial purposes; and

"Whereas over 1,000,000 acres of lands of this State are solely dependent upon the Colorado River as a source of water supply for irrigation purposes; and

"Whereas there is now pending in the United States Senate a bill (S. 75) which, if enacted, would authorize the central Arizona project; and

"Whereas there is insufficient water available in the lower basin of the Colorado River to supply the central Arizona project without depriving the people of California of their right to use that water and jeopardizing their investment in distribution facilities, which amounts to more than $500,000,000; and

"Whereas the States of California and Arizona have been unable to agree as to their respective rights to the use of the water of the Colorado River; and

"Whereas resolutions (S. J. Res. 4 and H. J. Res. 3) are now pending before the United States Congress which would, if adopted, authorize a suit in the United States Supreme Court to determine the respective rights of the States of Arizona, Nevada, and California to the use of the water of the Colorado River; and

"Whereas the authorization of the central Arizona project prior to an adjudication of water rights would greatly intensify the dispute between the States of California and Arizona and result in the possible expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars of public money to construct a project for which there would be an inadequate water supply: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the United States Congress is respectfully memorialized and urged to adopt one of the resolutions authorizing a suit in the United States Supreme Court to adjudicate the respective rights of the States of Arizona, Nevada, and California to the use of the water of the Colorado River; and be it further

"Resolved, That the United States Congress is respectfully memorialized and urged to suspend further consideration of the proposed central Arizona project pending the determination of the respective rights of the States of Arizona, Nevada, and California to the use of the water of the Colorado River; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

"Assembly Joint Resolution 15

"Joint resolution relative to the tidelands and submerged lands adjacent to the coast of California

"Whereas the United States has recognized that all the States since July 4, 1776, or since their admission to the Union, have exercised full powers of ownership over all lands beneath navigable waters within their boundaries and of all natural resources within these lands and waters; and

"Whereas each State has maintained full control of its natural resources with the acquiescence and approval of the United States and in accordance with numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and the executive departments of the United States that these lands and resources were vested in the respective States as an incident to State sovereignty and that the exercise of these powers of ownership and control did not and will not impair or interfere with the exercise by the Federal Government of its constitutional powers in relation to the control and regulation of commerce, navigation, national defense, and internation relations; and

"Whereas large sums of money have been expended by the several States, their subdivisions, and persons lawfully acting pursuant to State authority in improving and reclaiming lands, and in developing the natural resources in the lands and waters relying upon the recognized rule of State ownership; and

"Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States has recently held that the Federal Government has certain paramount powers in respect to a portion of these lands and natural resources without reaffirming or settling the ultimate question of their ownership and control; and

"Whereas this decision of the Supreme Court recognizes that the question of the ownership and control of these lands and natural resources is within the 'congressional area of national power' and that Congress will not execute its powers 'in such way as to bring about injustices to the States, their subdivisions, or persons acting pursuant to their permission': Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California (jointly), That it is in the public interest that title and ownership of the lands beneath navigable waters within the boundaries of the States be confirmed in these States by the Congress of the United States; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States recognize, confirm, and establish title to these lands in the States so concerned; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States release and relinquish to these States all right, title and interest which the United States has in these lands; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly is directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

Two joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Appropriations:

"Assembly Joint Resolution 6

"Joint resolution relative to California water projects

"Whereas it is evident from past experience in California that the cycle of dry years has not ended and in all probability will continue at least until 1950; and

"Whereas the underground water table in California has been receding year after year; and

"Whereas California farmers depend to a great extent upon underground water for the irrigation of specialty crops; and

"Whereas in some parts of the State the underground waters have already been polluted by the intrusion of salt water; and

"Whereas this condition is growing more serious each year and much of the land will be ruined unless the water supply is soon replenished; and

"Whereas Governor Warren has repeatedly stated that not a drop of water which can be conserved for a beneficial use should be wasted into the sea; and

"Whereas the President of the United States has recommended to the Congress that $113,000,000 be appropriated for the Central Valley and other water projects as authorized or to be authorized in California to be expended during the next fiscal year by the Bureau of Reclamation and the Corps of Army Engineers; and

"Whereas such an appropriation to California would go far to continue the prosperity of the State and would also stabilize the economy of the Federal Government in that such an appropriation at this time would be more or less in the nature of a loan, a large part of which would be returned to the Government by repayments and by continued large tax returns from California: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to appropriate the amount recommended by the President for expenditure for water projects in California during the next fiscal year to make possible the preservation of California lands through the replenishment and augmentation of its water supply at the earliest possible date; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly is hereby directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

"Assembly Joint Resolution 8

"Joint resolution relative to providing a veterans' hospital at San Diego

"Whereas the population of the city of San Diego includes the largest proportion of veterans of any California city; and

"Whereas existing Federal hospital facilities are not available to veterans except in case of emergency; and

"Whereas it was heretofore proposed to construct a 200-bed hospital in the Linda Vista section of the city of San Diego for the use of veterans, but funds were not made available for that purpose; and

"Whereas an acceptable site for a veterans' hospital in San Diego is presently owned by the Federal Government: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the President and the Congress of the United States are hereby respectfully memorialized and requested to make funds available and to provide for the construction of a 200-bed hospital for veterans in the city of San Diego; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly is directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"Assembly Joint Resolution 13

"Joint resolution relative to memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States in relation to establishing parity prices for California products

"Whereas in order to lend stability to the agricultural industry of the United States, Federal legislation has been enacted providing for support prices for a number of agricultural products; and

"Whereas such legislation operates to provide a floor below which the level of prices paid to the producers of products covered by such legislation will not fall, and thus assures to such producer a minimum payment designed to effect a parity of income between such producers and other classes of citizens as calculated for a prescribed base period in certain years preceding World War I during which the relationship between agricultural, industrial, and other income was in what is considered to have been a desirable condition; and

"Whereas such support prices are provided for a number of basic and staple products and operate as insurance to the producers of such products against the effects of fluctuations of the market prices thereof below the level necessary to provide an adequate income to such producers; and

"Whereas the State of California, by reason of its climatic conditions, is suitable for the production of specialty crops, notably fruits and vegetables, which are extensively produced in the State, the farm value thereof in 1947 being more than $700,000,000; and

"Whereas the producers of such specialty crops must compete with the producers of crops protected by such support prices in the purchase of farm supplies, the recruitment of farm labor, and in all other services or supplies necessary for farm operations; and

"Whereas the need for the protection afforded by support prices does not depend upon the nature of the crop produced but rather upon a number of conditions to which farming operations are subject and over which the individual farmer has no control; and

"Whereas the same facts that justify support prices for producers of basic commodities equally justify support prices for all agricultural commodities produced in commercial quantities: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Legislature of the State of California hereby respectfully memorializes and requests the President and the Congress of the United States to take such steps as may be necessary to provide for the extension of congressional legislation relating to support prices and parity payments to cover all agricultural commodities produced in commercial quantities and to provide uniform standards of eligibility for such support-price assistance for all agricultural commodities commercially produced; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk for the assembly is directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States."

R., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the inclusion of Puerto Rico in the bill for Federal aid to education; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

A letter in the nature of a petition, signed by Charles F. By Mr. LANGER:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

"House Concurrent Resolution A

"Concurrent resolution petitioning Congress to enact permanent legislation to maintain a floor of not less than 100 percent of parity on all basic farm crops

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the senate concurring therein):

"Whereas it must be self-evident that if we are to avoid lower living standards and if this national debt is to be serviced and paid, it must be through the production of new wealth from the natural resources of the United States; and

"We therefore recommend that the Eighty-first Congress enact legislation in 1949 which will first provide a new parity formula which is fair to farmers and to the consumers of the Nation. We recommend that support prices be established pursuant to this fair parity formula under which farmers shall be assured not of fractional parity but of 100 percent of the parity prices. These prices should be consistent with the objective of abundant production. We believe that in the new legislation account should be taken where they have an opportunity for decent living standards, including adequate health protection, good housing and better educational opportunities for farm children: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the senate concurring therein), That we hereby petition Congress to pass permanent legislation to maintain a floor of not less than 100 percent of parity on all basic farm crops, to protect such floor prices with commodity loans of like amount and to prescribe such import duties, excise taxes, or quotas on competitive imports as may be needed to maintain these price levels and our national income and to equalize the differential between the dollar value of our production and that of foreign countries; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution properly authenticated be forwarded by the secretary of state to the Presiding Officer of each House of the National Congress and to each of the United States Senators and Representatives from North Dakota, and the Departments of Agriculture and Labor at Washington, D. C."

By Mr. McCLELLAN:

A resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"House Resolution 11

"Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to pass, and the President of the United States to approve, if passed, the General Pulaski's Memorial Day resolution now pending in Congress

"Whereas a resolution providing for the President of the United States of America to proclaim October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski is now pending in the present session of the United States Congress; and

"Whereas the 11th day of October 1779 is the date in American history of the heroic death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, who died from wounds received on October 9, 1779, at the siege of Savannah, Ga.; and

"Whereas the States of Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Nevada, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and other States of the Union, through legislative enactment designated October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day; and

"Whereas it is fitting that the recurring anniversary of this day be commemorated with suitable patriotic and public exercises in observing and commemorating the heroic death of this great American hero of the Revolutionary War; and

"Whereas the Congress of the United States of America has by legislative enactment designated from October 11, 1929, to October 11, 1946, to be General Pulaski's Memorial Day in the United States of America: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas:

"SECTION 1. That we hereby memorialize and petition the Congress of the United States to pass, and the President of the United States to approve, if passed, the General Pulaski's Memorial Day resolution now pending in the United States Congress.

"SEC. 2. That certified copies of this resolution, properly authenticated, be sent forthwith to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, and each of the United States Senators and Representatives from Arkansas."

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INFLATION—RESOLUTION OF NORTHERN BERKSHIRE MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a resolution adopted by the Northern Berkshire Ministerial Association of Massachusetts, concerning the problem of inflation, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD. The resolution is interesting, and I hope it will be read by Members of the Senate.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORTH ADAMS, MASS., February 3, 1949.

Mr. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL,
The Senate Office Building,

DEAR MR. SALTONSTALL: The Northern Berkshire Ministerial Association of Massachusetts, at its meeting on January 3, 1949, adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas we are deeply concerned about the evils resulting from the present-day period of inflation in the United States—the fact that millions of people suffer great hardships and are the victims of ever-deepening anxieties because of the disastrously high cost of living; and

"Whereas we are certain that excessive inflationary prices for all the basic necessities of life are a serious menace to our entire economic and political system and bring our United States free-enterprise ideals into jeopardy or disrepute: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we urge the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, the officers of the National Association of Manufacturers, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, the American Federation of Labor, the United Mine Workers, and the press to cooperate in doing immediately whatever is possible to lower the cost of living for every person in the United States, believing that no greater service could be done for our entire Nation at this time of bewilderment and anxiety than to help the United States to a wiser and safer basis for our cost of living; and be it furthermore

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to President Harry S. Truman; to our National Congress; to the officers of the National Association of Manufacturers; to William Green, of the American Federation of Labor; to Philip Murray, of the Congress of Industrial Organizations; to John L. Lewis, of the United Mine Workers; and to the editor of the North Adams Transcript."

PHILIP L. FRICK,
VICTOR B. CHICOINE,
ELMER N. HALEY,
Members of the Committee.

WATER POWER DEVELOPMENT—RESOLUTION OF NATIONAL RURAL ELECTRIC COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, last week the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association met in New York, about 4,000 being present. The association adopted a resolution specifically endorsing the Missouri Valley Authority, the Columbia River Authority, and the St. Lawrence waterway project. I ask for its proper reference, and that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Works, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We support early, unified development of all of America's river basins for the fullest possible production of economic hydroelectric power consistent with other purposes.

We support the recommendations of the President and his Council of Economic Advisers, submitted to the Congress in the Economic Report and Review, for immediate action on the St. Lawrence, the Missouri, and the Columbia Rivers, construction of the TVA steam plant and other power facilities.

We are disturbed by reports that the Missouri Basin plans include less than half of feasible economic hydroelectric power, indicating that construction is proceeding without even a total survey of potentialities, or without a basin-wide plan for water operation and management in future years.

While supporting the specific projects calendared by the President and his advisers, we also urge prompt action on other basin developments which have been suggested throughout the Nation. A Nation-wide power development program is necessary at once to meet present shortages and increasing demand.

NATIONAL PARKS AND MONUMENTS—RESOLUTION OF PORTLAND (OREG.) CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the Portland, Oreg., Chamber of Commerce, relating to national parks and monuments.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the national parks and monuments constitute one of the great resources for public recreation and the study of natural history in the United States; and

Whereas the 174 areas of the national park system attracted last year 25,250,000 visitors; and

Whereas Crater Lake, Rainier, Olympic National Park nearby, and Yosemite, Lassen, Yellowstone and Glacier at a somewhat greater distance, have a special appeal to the people of Portland; and

Whereas of the $115,000,000 needed for physical improvement of the national parks, Congress has appropriated for such purpose only $1,652,350, of which $762,350 was earmarked for specific purposes, thus leaving for the physical improvement of all other national parks only $690,000; and

Whereas for maintenance of roads and trails in the national parks $3,500,000 was estimated, of which $3,100,000 was appropriated, but of which only $2,500,000 can be allotted for maintenance: Be it

Resolved, That the Portland Chamber of Commerce urge the congressional delegations of the Western States united effort in obtaining for the national parks such appropriations for maintenance, protection and improvement of existing buildings, highways and scenic trails as will make them more valuable to the tourists of the Nation; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be furnished to each of the Senators and Representatives representing the Western States, and that copies be forwarded to Newton B. Drury, Director, and Frank A. Kittredge, Chief Engineer, of the National Park Service, Washington, D. C.

NATIONAL FOREST RECREATION AREAS—RESOLUTION OF PORTLAND (OREG.) CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a resolution adopted by the Portland (Oreg.) Chamber of Commerce, relating to the national forest recreation areas, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the four principal resources of the national forests are: (1) timber, (2) water, (3) recreation and (4) forage; and

Whereas no funds have been provided in the budget of the United States Forest Service by Congress specifically and regularly for recreational development; and

Whereas many of the campground facilities provided by CCC labor and others, have deteriorated to the point where they are no longer usable, nor even subject to repair because of lack of maintenance money; and

Whereas the National Forest Service is badly in need of men and money to care for existing facilities and to install the additional ones made necessary by tremendously increased public use; and

Whereas the business establishments whose livelihood is dependent upon recreationists' patronage and whose income and other taxes largely contribute to repaying such Federal expenditures: Be it

Resolved, That the Portland Chamber of Commerce urge the congressional delegations of the Western States united effort in obtaining recognition of recreation as a principal resource of the national forests and in making available sufficient funds to assure proper rehabilitation of existing camp and picnic facilities and to install the additional ones made necessary by the increased public use; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be furnished to each of the Senators and Representatives of the Western States and that copies be forwarded to Secretary of Agriculture Charles Brannan and Chief Forester Lyle Watts.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. McGRATH, from the Committee on the District of Columbia:

S. 135. A bill to authorize the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia to establish daylight-saving time in the District; without amendment (Rept. No. 40).

By Mr. CONNALLY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. J. Res. 36. Joint resolution for the authorization of a special contribution by the United States to the United Nations for the relief of Palestine refugees; with amendments (Rept. No. 42).

INVESTIGATION OF PRICES OF AGRICULTURAL AND OTHER COMMODITIES—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. MAYBANK. From the Committee on Banking and Currency I report favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 31, to investigate prices of agricultural and other commodities, submitted by me on January 13, 1949, and I submit a report (No. 41) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received, and, under the rule, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. MAYBANK. I now ask unanimous consent that following my remarks in the RECORD there appear clippings from various newspapers in connection with retail prices and the decline in agricultural prices throughout the Nation.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal of February 5, 1949]

PRICE TRENDS—COFFEE, CORN, SCRAP, AND STEERS—COMMODITIES—ARE MOVING DOWNWARD—FUTURES MARKETS HINT SLIDE MAY CONTINUE; FOODS ARE AMONG WEAKEST STAPLES—FUEL OIL, LUMBER, COAL OFF

Commodity markets sputtered warnings of further deflation this week.

From coffee to corn, from steel scrap to steers, prices dipped nervously. It was a continuation and quickening of a price trend noticeable all last month.

Basic foodstuffs have been among the pace setters in the downhill race. For instance, glance at what's happening to steak-on-the-hoof. A steer worth $30.50 a hundred pounds in Chicago barely a month ago was priced at only $24.50 a hundred yesterday.

Corn, the principal feed that makes meat, milk, butter, and eggs, sold in Chicago yesterday at $1.27 a bushel, the lowest in 2 years. A month ago corn was worth $1.50. A year ago it sold for $2.52.

At 42 cents a dozen in the big Chicago wholesale market yesterday, eggs were 7 cents a dozen cheaper than 4 weeks ago and nearly 20 cents cheaper than at the end of 1947.

FURTHER IN THE FUTURE?

Prices in the futures markets demonstrated an expectation of cheapening of the cost of supplying a dinner table. The Dow Jones Commodity Futures Index, which reflects prices commodity men think will prevail 5 months hence, closed the day yesterday at the lowest level since mid-1947. It has dipped steadily and steeply since early December.

But the price trend is far broader than the food field. Worth $43 a ton at Pittsburgh a month ago, heavy steel scrap is now quoted there at $39 a ton. In other cities it has dropped even more. Steel scrap is a basic raw material in making finished steel, which has been one of the last lingering scarcities in the Nation's economy.

In other metals—copper, lead, zinc, tin—official price quotations thus far hold firm. But, significantly, the premiums that were paid above official quotations not long ago have faded from the scene. And out of Waterbury, Conn., the Nation's brass-producing center, came the report this week that big brass makers had found their January new orders falling 20 percent below the December level. The brass industry is a major consumer of copper. On top of this, a labor tie-up of the vast Kennecott copper mines in Utah is apparently nearing its end. Its ore could be refined in about 90 days.

BUILDING MATERIALS

Sky-high building materials, which have kept many a would-be home owner from buying or building, are also weakening. Lumber, the bellwether, in the past 2 months has had its sharpest price spill since the war's end.

In lumber, as in most other materials of home and industry, the story is one of huge production catching up with or passing demand. Lumber mills poured out about 38,000,000,000 board feet of lumber last year, half again as much as was milled in prewar 1939.

While this lumber flood was rising, the number of new homes put under construction started slipping last June, and has been falling ever since. In the latter part of 1948 the mills found themselves producing more lumber than they were selling. Lumber that had sold in New York for $120 a thousand feet in late 1948 was down to $105 a thousand by late January.

Fuel prices, too, are joining the downward slide. Heavy production of bituminous coal, helped by a light winter in the East, is bearing down on the cost of that major food for furnaces. Some coal has changed hands recently at prices 20 to 25 percent below the level of a few months ago.

OIL GOES DOWN

And what's happening in coal is happening in fuel oil. With supplies burdensomely high, four successive cuts within the past 2 months lopped about 30 percent from the cost of heavy fuel oil in the big east coast consuming area.

FOOD PRICES CONTINUE TO DECLINE FOLLOWING DIP IN FUTURES; NOURSE CALLS CROP PROSPECTS KEY TO TREND

WASHINGTON.—Food prices generally continued their slide yesterday following new sharp declines in commodity prices. But Dr. Edwin G. Nourse, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, believes there is nothing disturbing in the situation.

Dr. Nourse said the recent downward trend reflected last year's large crops rather than any basic trend. He added that whether prices start up again depends on prospects for this year's crops.

Long-range economic prophets reexamined their predictions, however, on the reports of new declines.

Statistics of the National Industrial Conference Board indicated that the downward inclination was sharp even in December. The board's consumer index showed food prices were off 1.2 percent in that month from December. The board's general index, which includes housing, clothing, fuel, house furnishings, and sundries in addition to food, dropped only 0.6 percent during December.

EGG, MEAT PRICES DOWN

Two big eastern grocery chains yesterday announced they were passing on to their customers immediately the fall in some commodity prices. One, Grand Union Stores, cut grade A white eggs from 65 cents to 63 cents, and grade A large brown eggs from 61 cents to 59 cents. This followed a 1-cent decline in the wholesale market. The reduction in retail price for both brown and white eggs totals 6 cents since February 1.

The New York City Markets Department reported retail meat prices in the city dropped 2 to 4 cents a pound in the past week.

Despite Dr. Nourse's reassurances, and an opinion by Agriculture Secretary Brannan that the sag was only an adjustment, some observers showed marked concern.

Charles W. Holman, secretary of the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation, said the collapse in prices paid to Midwest dairy farmers is threatening future milk and meat production.

He asserted that milk prices have fallen far below production costs and that some farmers are selling their cows. "Dairy cow numbers are at the lowest point since 1940," he said, "and the decline last year was the sharpest in history.

"With our added losses in the recent western storms, this will be reflected in shortages and higher prices for milk and meat."

Mr. Holman held that lower dairy prices are unwarranted, and result from temporary surpluses. He said current prices of milk used in making dairy products have fallen as low as $2.45 for 100 pounds, compared to over $4 in June last year.

MILK, BUTTERFAT PRICE SUPPORTS

In Washington, meanwhile, the Agriculture Department announced it was working on plans to support the price of milk and butterfat. Butterfat prices have slumped down near levels at which the Government is required to support them.

A Department official said an announcement may be made soon on the support program for butterfat at 90 percent of parity. He declined to say exactly what method would be used, but he indicated the most feasible way would be to buy butter itself at a price which would lend strength to butterfat.

Representative HOEVEN (Republican, Iowa) said there are disturbing signs of weakness in the farm-price picture, with the demand for meat down a half pound per person per month. He said individual consumption of bread, cereal products, and potatoes also is on the down grade. Mr. HOEVEN's conclusion was that consumers aren't willing to spend as much of their income for food as they did during war days.

CANADA LIVING COSTS HIGHER

OTTAWA.—The official cost of living jumped seven-tenths of a point during December, bouncing back to its high of 159.6, according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

This increase erased exactly the seven-tenths of a point drop—the first in 23 months—which had taken place during November.

EXPERTS STILL WORRIED ABOUT INFLATION DESPITE SHARP MARKET BREAK

Despite the sharp break in stock and commodity prices last week, some Washington officials say inflation rather than the threat of a depression still is the Nation's most immediate economic problem.

While losses of some stock shares were being extended as much as $3 in Saturday's trading, Secretary of Labor Tobin and Dr. Edwin G. Nourse, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, chorused that they were not alarmed. And Senator O'MAHONEY, Democrat, of Wyoming, said "the postwar boom has not ended," and that prices still are higher than they ought to be.

The Senate-House Joint Economic Committee, of which Senator O'MAHONEY is chairman, called a public round-table session to open tomorrow. It invited in both agriculture and economic experts to ascertain whether the break in prices and increasing unemployment presages a general depression or is nothing more than a postwar adjustment.

CONSUMER PRICES STILL HIGH

In addition to the sharp price breaks, January employment was reported to be off 700,000, but Senator O'MAHONEY said the 57,500,000 persons employed last month were more than were employed in the first 3 months of 1948.

"We still have a problem in inflationary pressure," he said, "because as long as the Government and people who are employed are buying things they want, the pressure is upward. Wholesale prices have not dropped halfway down to the level they occupied in 1947. Consumer prices haven't dropped nearly as far as wholesale prices."

Although the week ended with grain prices on the Chicago Board of Trade showing some rallying tendency, cash corn was at its lowest price since December 1945, and 35 cents under the Government support level. With steers and heifers at the lowest price since 1947, some corn belt farmers were reported losing money on their operations. Hogs were at the lowest price since October 1946, except the January 3 quotations.

PRICE BREAK FAIRLY GENERAL

The week's price break was fairly general all along the line at the wholesale level. It included cotton, fats, oils, eggs and butter, with corn and cotton suffering the sharpest setbacks.

Cotton lost as much as $1.30 a bale in Saturday's trading, while the losses of up to $3 in stock shares were in addition to the Friday drops which ranged up to $5.

But the Agriculture Department said some recovery in the prices of meat and meat animals was in prospect within the next month or two and CIO research experts called a conference this week to assemble data which might be the basis for demands for a fourth-round wage increase.

The recommendations by the experts will be considered by the 51-member CIO executive committee March 2. The CIO convention last November declared itself in support of a fourth-round wage increase.

NEW SOAP PRICE CUTS

Two more top-soap manufacturers reduced wholesale prices yesterday on major household soap products.

Procter & Gamble Soap Co. and Lever Bros. followed Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Co. in announcing 6-percent reductions.

As a result two large grocery chains in the East trimmed price tags as much as 2 cents. Bohack & Co., operating in Brooklyn and Long Island, and Grand Union Co. with stores in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Vermont, announced lower prices on soap flakes, powder, cakes, and synthetic detergents.

REVISION, ETC., OF ARTICLES OF WAR—UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War and the Articles of the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard, and to reenact and to establish a uniform code of justice.

In connection with the introduction of the bill, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a release by Defense Secretary Forrestal, concerning the need for uniform military justice. The release is submitted by him for the consideration of the Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the release will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 857) to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard and to enact and establish a uniform code of military justice, introduced by Mr. TYDINGS, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

There being no objection, the release by Secretary Forrestal was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNIFORM CODE OF MILITARY JUSTICE

Secretary of Defense James Forrestal today submitted to Congress a proposed uniform code of military justice for the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard.

The proposed code, based on a study by a special committee, would supersede the Articles of War, including the amendments effective February 1 which were made by the Selective Service Act of 1948, under which the Army and Air Force courts martial systems operate, and the Articles for Government of the Navy. It would be uniformly applicable to all the armed forces in time of war and peace.

Secretary Forrestal asked the committee, appointed last August, of which Prof. Edmund M. Morgan of the Harvard Law School is chairman, to prepare a code, uniform in substance and in interpretation and application, that would protect the rights of those subject to it and increase public confidence in military justice without impairing performance of military functions.

In providing for uniformity, the proposed code makes all punishable offenses identical for all the armed forces, sets up the same system of courts for each and the same procedures, including those for a Board of Review in each Department and a single Judicial Council which is the court of last resort for each of the forces.

This single Judicial Council, composed of civilians, would make final decisions on all questions of law and also act with the Judge Advocates General of the three Departments as an advisory body to secure uniformity in policy and in sentences and to correct any defects discovered in the system and its administration.

The courts provided for each Department are: (1) General, for capital and other serious offenses; (2) Special, for less serious offenses; (3) Summary, for minor offenses.

Chairman Morgan, in a summary of some of the more important provisions of the proposed code, points out those designed to provide for uniformity in administration, those designed to assure the accused a fair trial, those designed to prevent undue control or interference with the administration of justice, and those designed to preserve appropriate military functions.

Outstanding among the provisions in the proposed code are those made to give added legal protection to enlisted men and other accused persons and to prevent discriminations between enlisted persons and officers. These include certain limitations of command authority, provision for enlisted men to sit as members of general and special courts martial, the right of the accused to peremptory challenge of a member of a court martial and the right to be represented by defense counsel equally qualified with trial counsel.

While the commanding officer would appoint the court martial and it would make its findings under his command, appeals would be reviewed concerning law and fact in higher echelons not under his control. Voting on challenges, findings and sentence also would be by secret ballot of the members of the court martial.

A commanding officer is forbidden to censure a court martial, or any member or officer, because of any judicial action. Any attempt improperly to influence action by anyone in any aspect of a trial or its review is also forbidden.

Provisions concerning general courts martial require a pretrial investigation, which the accused may attend, with counsel, to present evidence and cross-examine witnesses. Trial is prohibited on any charge which does not state an offense or is not supported by sufficient evidence. It also is mandatory that the defendant be provided with competent, legally trained legal counsel and enlisted men have the privilege of having enlisted men as members of the court. A law officer, who is not a member of the court, with the duty to instruct the court on questions of law, is also provided.

A stenographic record of a general court martial must be made and review of the record for errors of law and of fact by a board of review is automatic, with the right of the accused to be represented by legally competent counsel on appeal. Review by the judicial council, for errors of law, is automatic where a death sentence or dismissal is involved and may be obtained by petition showing probable error of law where sentence imposes more than 1 year's confinement or a discharge.

In special courts martial it is not required that the defense counsel be a lawyer unless the prosecuting counsel is. Both must be equally qualified, however. Enlisted men may have enlisted men as members of the court. If a bad-conduct discharge is imposed, a full stenographic transcript must be made and the case reviewed in the same manner as a general court-martial record.

Peremptory challenge of a member of a special court martial is provided, as in a general court martial; also voting by secret ballot. Review by the judge advocate or legal officer is required.

Provision is made for permitting an accused person to refuse trial by a summary court (trial by a designated officer) if he prefers to be tried by a special court martial. He then would have the privilege of counsel and of having enlisted men on the court if he were an enlisted man. Review by a judge advocate or legal officer is required.

Among the provisions to prevent interference with due administration of justice are:

1. The convening authority may not refer charges for trial until they are found legally sufficient by the staff judge advocate or legal officer.

2. The staff judge advocate or legal officer is authorized to communicate directly with the Judge Advocate General.

3. All counsel at a general court martial trial are required to be lawyers and to be certified by the Judge Advocate General as qualified to perform their legal duties.

4. The law officer—a competent lawyer—rules on all questions raised at the trial, except on a motion for a directed verdict and on the issue of the accused's sanity.

5. The commander, who is the convening authority, must not act on a finding or sentence of a general court martial without first obtaining the advice of his staff judge advocate or legal officer.

6. The board of review, located in the office of the Judge Advocate General and removed from the convening authority, is composed of legally trained men and reviews the trial record for errors of law and of fact.

7. The judicial council is composed of civilians and passes finally on all questions of law.

8. When counsel appear before the board of review and the judicial council, both parties must be represented by qualified lawyers.

9. Censure by a commanding officer of a court martial or any member or officer thereof because of any judicial action of the court or any member or officer is forbidden and any attempt improperly to influence official action in any aspect of a trial or its review is prohibited.

Among command functions the proposed code would retain are:

1. Commanding officers refer the charges in general, special, and summary courts martial and convene the courts.

2. Commanding officers appoint the members of the courts.

3. Commanding officers appoint the law officer and counsel for the trial.

4. Commanding officers retain full power to set aside findings of guilty and to modify or change the sentence, but are not permitted to interfere with verdicts of not guilty nor to increase the severity of the sentence imposed.

5. The powers of commanding officers at mast and company punishment are retained for minor offenses which require prompt action and for which comparatively light punishments can be imposed. The procedural safeguards in this type of nonjudicial punishment are considerably less than in the courts martial but are believed to be reasonably adequate.

In addition to Chairman Morgan, the members of the Committee on a Uniform Code of Military Justice are Under Secretary of the Navy W. John Kenney, Assistant Secretary of the Army Gordon Gray, and Assistant Secretary of the Air Force Eugene M. Zuckert.

Felix E. Larkin, assistant general counsel, Office of the Secretary of Defense, acted as executive chairman of the committee and as chairman of a working group composed of representatives of the Army, Navy, and Air Force, with an unofficial observer representing the Coast Guard, which in time of war operates as part of the Navy.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—AMENDMENT RELATING TO SCHOOL-LUNCH PROGRAM

Mr. PEPPER (for himself and Mr. HOLLAND) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill, fiscal year 1950, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page —, lines —, strike out the words "To enable the Secretary to carry out the provisions of the National School Lunch Act (42 U. S. C. 1751–1760), there is hereby made available $——— of the funds appropriated for the current fiscal year 1950 by section 32 of the act approved August 24, 1935 (7 U. S. C. 612 (c)), such amount to be without regard to the 25 percent limitation contained in said section 32, and to be exclusive of funds expended in accordance with the last sentence of section 9 of the National School Lunch Act: Provided, That no part of such funds shall be used for nonfood assistance under section 5 of said act." And substitute therefor the words "To enable the Secretary to carry out the provisions of the National School-Lunch Act of June 4, 1946 (42 U. S. C. 1751–1760), $150,000,000.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 2361) to provide for the reorganization of Government agencies, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 22) suspending legislative budget until May 1, 1949, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CONSOLIDATION OF GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILLS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], and myself, I submit for appropriate reference a concurrent resolution providing for a single appropriation bill, and I ask unanimous consent that an explanatory statement by me of the concurrent resolution be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 16) was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the joint rule of the Senate and of the House of Representatives contained in section 138 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) (1) Commencing with the second session of the Eighty-first Congress, all general appropriations for each fiscal year shall be consolidated in one general appropriation bill to be known as the Consolidated General Appropriation Act of —— (the blank to be filled in with the calendar year in which the fiscal year for which such appropriations are being made ends). As used in this paragraph the term 'general appropriations' shall not include deficiency or supplemental appropriations.

"(2) The consolidated general appropriation bill, and each deficiency or supplemental general appropriation bill, shall show in tabular form by items and totals (A) each item of appropriation, (B) the amount to be expended in the ensuing fiscal year from such appropriation, (C) the amount to be expended in the ensuing fiscal year from all other appropriations made in prior years for the same purpose as the item of appropriation referred to in clause (A) is made, (D) the total amount to be expended in the ensuing fiscal year from such appropriations, and (E) that part of the item of appropriation referred to in clause (A) which will be available for expenditure subsequent to the close of the ensuing fiscal year.

"(3) Amendments to any general appropriation bill which would have the effect of changing any figures required to be shown by paragraph 2 of this subsection, shall contain a provision changing such figures to conform to the proposed amendment.

"(4) No general appropriation bill and no amendment thereto shall be received or considered in either House unless it conforms with this rule."

The explanatory statement presented by Mr. BYRD was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD

Under present procedure neither Congress nor the American public has an opportunity intelligently to analyze fiscal legislation. If such an analysis could be made, I believe it would be a measurable deterrent to nonessential Federal expenditures. For this reason a joint resolution was introduced in the United States Senate today to provide for consideration of all regular appropriations in one bill each year.

Sponsors of the resolution were: Senators BYRD, BUTLER, BRIDGES, O'CONOR, KNOWLAND, and GILLETTE.

The Federal Government of the United States is the biggest financial operation on earth and nothing is as economically important to as many people as the fiscal situation of this country. Yet, we attempt to finance vast domestic and world programs through legislative processes in which it is impossible to know whether income and outgo are in balance until after the budget is enacted.

Most of the difficulty in comprehending budgetary action arises from confusing language and archaic procedure. In these days of huge multiyear programs and projects an appropriation may be available for expenditure in more than 1 year. Most of an appropriation adopted in a year when revenue is high may actually be spent in a year when revenue is low.

There may be vast difference between appropriations and expenditures in a given fiscal year. But spending legislation is always considered in terms of appropriations, while revenue must be comparable to expenditures—not appropriations. There is no readily available facility for either Congress or the public to translate current and previous appropriations into terms of annual expenditures either by items or by totals.

As Congress passes spending bills under present procedure it has no idea as to what the over-all total of either appropriations of expenditures will be. Under the system the President submits a budget message requesting appropriations and revenue, and after that the budget picture is never seen again as a whole until after it has become the law of the land.

Congress breaks down the appropriation side of the budget message into a dozen or more bills each dealing with a group of activities. Each bill is handled separately by a different subcommittee in each House of Congress. They are brought in one by one for passage over a period of 6 months. They are not accompanied by an expenditure estimate. There is no way of telling what total appropriations or expenditures are, and there is no way of comparing the effect of action on the bills with the revenue situation.

It is impossible to consider appropriation items by relative merits, importance, or cost in view of the whole fiscal situation. The bills are passed as separate and unrelated pieces. If the public knew what was in these money bills as they are considered I am confident its demand for elimination of at least the obvious nonessentials would be vigorous.

A long initial step toward this end would be accomplished by adoption of a single appropriation bill which would consolidate and total all appropriation items into one act and specify how much of each item could be obligated in the ensuing year. And such a bill would be accompanied by a report translating appropriations into expenditures. It would be considered as a whole and in full view of the revenue side of the budget.

This would be accomplished under the resolution introduced today which actually would require only a simple change in the rules of congressional procedure. The facts that the resolution would simplify procedure and facilitate proper consideration of fiscal legislation should justify adoption of the resolution. If it serves as a deterrent to nonessential items, that was never more urgently needed.

ADDITIONAL ASSISTANTS TO COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. KILGORE (for Mr. MCCARRAN) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 66), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is authorized, until otherwise provided by law, to employ two additional professional staff members and three additional clerical assistants to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at rates of compensation to be fixed by the chairman in accordance with section 202 (e) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 and the provisions of Public Law 4, Eightieth Congress, approved February 19, 1947.

CERTAIN HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

Mr. MAGNUSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 67), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Resolved, That in holding hearings, the report of such hearings and of making investigations, as authorized by section 134 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized during the Eighty-first Congress to make such expenditures and to employ upon a temporary basis such investigators, and such technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable.

SEC. 2. The expenses of the committee under this resolution shall not exceed $10,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

SEC. 3. Upon the termination of the special committee, authorized pursuant to Senate Resolution 20, Eightieth Congress, to study problems of American small business and enterprises, those files and records of such committee relating to small business and enterprises falling within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as defined in part I, section 102 (j) Public Law 601; shall be transferred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ARREST AND TRIAL OF CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 57) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate condemns as unjust the arrest, confinement incommunicado, and trial of His Eminence Josef Cardinal Mindszenty, Roman Catholic primate of Hungary.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. What is the status of this matter?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, unless some other disposition is made of it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does it not go to the committee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not, except on motion or request. A resolution coming over from a previous day automatically comes before the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Was this resolution considered yesterday at all?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution was submitted yesterday, and under the rule had to lie over for 1 day.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then it is simply before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is before the Senate. The question is whether the Senate will agree to it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] that Senate Resolution 57 be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN subsequently said: Mr. President, as I understand the action just taken by the Senate, the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], calling for some action on the part of the Senate expressing its sentiment in the Mindszenty case, has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. BALDWIN. It seems to me Mr. President, that if the sentiment of the Senate is going to be of any use in this particular matter, we should have an opportunity to vote on it today on the floor of the Senate. I regret that when the subject came up on the floor of the Senate today, the Senator from New Hampshire was not here. I assume he did not anticipate it was going to be taken up so early.

I wish to explain that my vote was not a vote in opposition to the resolution, but I voted "no" against a reference of the resolution to the committee, because it seemed to me that if we in the Senate were going to take any action which would be in any way helpful in that case, by expressing the sentiment of this body as to the inhuman treatment the cardinal has received, today is the day we should take it. I regret very much that the resolution has been referred to the Foreign Relations Committee, so that we cannot have an opportunity to act on it today.

NOTICE OF HEARING BY COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations had planned to hear Mr. Paul Hoffman, the Administrator of the ECA, further this afternoon at 2 o'clock. On reconsidering the matter the committee determined that it would hold a hearing tomorrow at 10:30, in the caucus room in the Senate Office Building, and that it would be open to the public. I make this anncuncement for the information of the press and others who may be interested.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF ANTHONY J. DIMOND TO BE UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE, DIVISION NO. 3, DISTRICT OF ALASKA

Anthony J. Dimond, of Alaska, to be United States district judge, division No. 3, District of Alaska. Judge Dimond is now serving in this office under an appointment which expired February 10, 1948. At the indicated time and place all persons interested in the nomination may make such representations as may be pertinent. [Mr. O'CONOR asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial with respect to the case of Josef Cardinal Mindszenty, published in the Baltimore News-Post of February 7, 1949, which appears in the Appendix.]

MORE HASTE, LESS SPEED—EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I should like to read three sentences from an editorial published in this morning's Washington Post, and then ask to have the full editorial inserted in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks. Is it appropriate for me to do so?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Strictly speaking it is not, but the Chair——

Mr. MORSE. I would not want to do it if in doing so I did not comply strictly with the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has sought to emphasize the fact that under the Senate rule no speeches of any length are in order at this time.

Mr. MORSE. I do not wish to make a speech. I simply want to read from material which I wish to place in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reading extracts from the editorial would constitute debate.

Mr. MORSE. Then Mr. President, I ask unanmious consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD an excellent editorial entitled "More Haste, Less Speed," published in this morning's Washington Post.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORE HASTE, LESS SPEED

If the Senate Labor Committee holds to its announced schedule, hearings on the proposed substitute for the Taft-Hartley Act will close on Thursday. It is now unmistakably evident that the committee cannot in the next 3 days hear more than a small fraction of the witnesses demanding an opportunity to state their views. Nor will it have before it all the information it will need for the delicate task of rewriting the law controlling labor-management relations. A Senate committee cannot act on so momentous an issue with such haste without opening itself to the charge of substituting the rubber stamp for full inquiry and legislative deliberation.

This unreasonable haste will not work to the advantage of labor, the Administration or the committee. No organic labor-management legislation can work well or last long unless it wins general public support, and that will be forthcoming only if the public believes that the legislation has been shaped with deliberation and in a spirit of sensible compromise. The Administration ought to be aware of the fact that legislative tempers are already frayed because of this unreasonable haste. Thus the executive-legislative unity that is so essential to carrying out the President's program is in danger of being undermined for no good reason. Another week or 10 days of hearings would go a long way toward convincing both legislators and the people that the Administration is seeking legislation in the public interest and not merely to pay a political debt.

JOSEF CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, from all over my State I have received letters and resolutions voicing the indignation of the people of Wisconsin of all faiths against the trial and sentencing of courageous Cardinal Mindszenty.

I have issued today a statement in protest against this shocking procedure.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point a gracious letter which I have received from Mr. J. Marlowe Boyle, of Milwaukee, regarding the trial, and that there be printed following Mr. Boyle's letter my statement supplementing my previous comments in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 10.

There being no objection, the letter and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGREGATION OF ST. ROSE,
Milwaukee, Wis., February 6, 1949.

The Honorable ALEXANDER WILEY,
United States Senate,

MY DEAR SENATOR: Only a cause justly serious and far-reaching in its implications could induce us to add to your burden of legislative duties with a request for your official and personal favor.

Your intimate knowledge of the deeply religious nature and innate dignity of the people of Wisconsin will enable you to fully understand and appreciate the great consternation aroused in us by the wholly unjustified arrest and imprisonment, on fabricated charges, of Josef Cardinal Mindszenty, primate of Hungary, by the Communist puppets who rule his nation through the voice of the Kremlin.

If the espousal of human rights and the dignity of man be crime; if the voice of a great spiritual leader raised in suppliance for the right of his people to worship their God be treason; then Cardinal Mindszenty is a criminal and a traitor, and is deserving of no outside help.

Since we know, however, that communism is in itself traitorous to the free individual and to his free democracy, then we must also conclude that his eminence is guilty only of being a churchman in a Communist controlled state.

It is on this basis, therefore, that we respectfully entreat your good offices for the purpose of lodging, through the Department of State and its official diplomatic channels to Budapest and Moscow, a vigorous protest against the most barbarous usurpation of human rights, epitomized in the arrest and imprisonment of Cardinal Mindszenty. It is our earnest hope that you will lend the influence of your office to the efforts to obtain the release of his eminence.

Respectfully yours,
ST. ROSE HOLY NAME SOCIETY,
J. MARLOWE BOYLE,
Catholic Action Chairman,
(On behalf of our 1,200 members.)

STATEMENT BY SENATOR ALEXANDER WILEY

RENEWED PROTEST AGAINST TRIAL OF CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

The civilized world has been shocked and outraged by the fraudulent trial of Josef Cardinal Mindszenty. The faked confession, based quite clearly upon the drugging of the courageous primate, the phony justice, and all the other elements of the trial have violated the conscience of men of good will of all religious faiths throughout the world.

Every decent individual throughout the globe, whether or not he or she is of Catholic faith, can say, "There but for the grace of God stands my minister or rabbi or spiritual leader." Cardinal Mindszenty represents the forces of man's spirit, the moral force of enlightened humanity against the fanatic hords of atheistic Communists; against the antichrist which has arisen in the form of the Communist International.

The trial of Cardinal Mindszenty is a fraud, a farce, a fanatic demonstration of the depravity of the leaders of the Communist state and their satellites.

The American Government must redouble its efforts to register with the Hungarian authorities the absolute indignation of all of its citizens of every faith against this shocking and sinful proceeding. This trial mocks the pious statements of Premier Stalin regarding his desire to see President Truman and work out a peace settlement.

Cardinal Mindszenty stands before the Red fanatics as a symbol of the ideological war between our way of life and the Red way. The sentence which will be imposed upon him tomorrow will be one more bar against any basis for real understanding between ourselves and the Red authorities.

How can we possibly negotiate with these depraved men who utilize every means to destroy the light of freedom and the light of spirit? How can we possibly talk with them around the conference table when they stand ready to crucify man's spirit?

The American Government has always spoken out against the persecution of religion, as I stated in my remarks printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 10. It must do so again and right now.

The persecution of Cardinal Mindszenty and Lutheran Bishop Ordass must be protested by every means at the command of our Government.

We had coddled the Red governments abroad. We have dealt with them with kid gloves. We have pampered them so that they believe they can get away with anything, regardless of how venal it may be.

The persecution of church leaders in Hungary must be condemned by the American Government and by all the western governments in the most vigorous, direct, and forthright terms and in the most meaningful way if we are to be worthy of our obligations as the upholders of the light of civilization.

The persecution which stems from the Marxian doctrine that religion is the opiate of the people must be branded by our Government as one of the most shocking demonstrations of Marxist materialism that any human being has witnessed on the face of this planet.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 130) to provide for the demonstration of public library service in areas without such service or with inadequate library facilities, was announced as first in order.

Mr. TAFT. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

LOSS OF OR DAMAGE TO PROPERTY DEPOSITED BY ALIEN ENEMIES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 29) to authorize payment of claims based on loss of or damage to property deposited by aliens, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, in line 2, after the figures "1707)", to insert "the possession of which property was not prohibited by law prior to said promulgations."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill? I should like to know how much money, if any, is involved in this commitment.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, we do not have an exact estimate of the amount, but the bill limits the amount which may be paid to any one person to $1,000. The idea is that the claims must come in under existing law, but that if such claims are in amounts of $1,000 or less, they can be settled without the enactment of special bills. Formerly that was prohibited by law.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 2, in line 5, after the word "ancestry", to strike out "with local police authorities."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, in line 13, after the word "prescribe", to insert a colon and the following proviso: "Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the Attorney General to pay or settle any claims for damage to or loss or destruction of property which had been used for espionage or for other illegal purposes on or before December 7, 1941."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, in line 22, after the word "any", to insert "decision or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Attorney General is hereby authorized to consider, ascertain, adjust, determine, settle, and pay in an amount not in excess of $1,000, when accepted by the claimant in full satisfaction and final settlement, any claim against the United States arising on or after December 7, 1941, for damage to, or loss or destruction of, personal property, the use, operation, possession, custody, or control of which was prohibited by proclamation No. 2525, dated December 7, 1941, and proclamations No. 2526 and No. 2527, dated December 8, 1941 (55 Stat., pt. 2, pp. 1700, 1705, and 1707), the possession of which property was not prohibited by law prior to said promulgations and which was deposited by alien enemies or United States citizens of Japanese ancestry in the manner provided in the regulations promulgated by the Attorney General on February 5, 1942, as amended (7 Fed. Reg. 844; 28 C. F. R. 30.1–30.16): Provided, That the damage to or loss or destruction of property shall not have been caused in whole or in part by any negligence or wrongful act on the part of the claimant, his agent, or employee, and that the claim is substantiated in such manner as the Attorney General may by regulation prescribe: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the Attorney General to pay or settle any claims for damage to or loss or destruction of property which had been used for espionage or for other illegal purposes on or before December 7, 1941.

SEC. 2. No claim shall be considered unless presented in writing within 1 year after the date of enactment of this act.

SEC. 3. Any decision or settlement made by the Attorney General under the authority of this act and such regulations as he may prescribe shall be final and conclusive, notwithstanding any other provision of law to the contrary.

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the immigration and naturalization laws the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to record the lawful admission for permanent residence of Jose S. Upon the enactment of this act the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number for each alien named herein from the quota of the appropriate country of the first year that the said quota is available.

The Secretary of State is directed to instruct the proper quota-control office to deduct one number from the appropriate quota for the first year that said quota is available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PREVENTION OF PURCHASE AND SALE OF PUBLIC OFFICE

The bill (S. 15) to amend the act entitled, "An act to prevent purchase and sale of public office," approved December 11, 1926, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KNOWLAND. May we have an explanation, please?

Mr. KILGORE. The bill is drawn at the request of the Civil Service Commission, to strengthen the law against attempts of persons, for fees, to procure appointment to any civil position in the United States Government. In other words, the endeavor is to prevent a person from being able to say, "For so much money I can get you an appointment as a clerk in the post office."

The bill would make it much easier to administer the law, and would fix the penalty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of December 11, 1926, entitled "An act to prevent purchase and sale of public office" (44 Stat. 918), is amended by adding the following new paragraph to section 2:

STAMPS COMMEMORATIVE OF THE THREE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF ANNAPOLIS, MD.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 22) to authorize the issuance of a special series of stamps commemorative of the three hundredth anniversary of Annapolis, Md., was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish to submit an observation in respect to this measure.

This is the first of the measures at this session ordering commemorative stamps. All of us are familiar with the fact that so many commemorative stamps for so many different purposes, and sometimes for highly doubtful ones, were ordered during the last session that the value of almost all commemorative stamps was diluted to a pathetic degree. Furthermore, the wholesale practice of ordering commemorative stamps resulted in very general condemnation throughout the country, not only among philatelists but also among those who are interested in preserving the value of the use of the postal service for commemorative ends.

Obviously, the objective of the joint resolution which is now before the Senate is a completely justified one; but it occurs to me that at the beginning of this session we should accommodate curselves to some type of procedure by which to put under some sort of discipline the business of the issuance of commemorative stamps. My own hope has been that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service would hold back all measures providing for the issuance of commemorative stamps until well toward the end of the session, assess the relative value of the purposes sought to be commemorated, and then in one final bill present to the Senate a budget of commemorative stamps, held within a reasonable number, and confined to the major events sought to be commemorated.

I have no desire to interfere with the authorization of commemorative stamps in connection with the three hundredth anniversary of Annapolis. I may ask the Senator from Maryland whether there is any such urgency in this matter that it would interfere with his hopes and aspirations in this connection if the joint resolution were to go over until the whole subject might have some collaborated consideration?

Mr. O'CONOR. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Michigan, I may say there is such urgency. The celebration is scheduled for this spring, and arrangements for it have already been made by civic leaders and organizations, officials of the Naval Academy, St. Johns College, and of other individuals in and around Annapolis. The joint resolution was actually passed by the Senate last year, but, at the end of the session, it failed of passage in the House.

It is thought this is an exceptional case. Agreeing entirely with all that has been said in the general connection by the distinguished Senator from Michigan, I can give assurance there have already been expressed in the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service sentiments which I am confident will result in a more coordinated program, although we do think this is an exceptional case.

Mr. VANDENBERG. My position in regard to making any exception is that one exception invites others. However, I hold to the statement of my friend from Maryland in connection with Annapolis, because this is so obviously justified, and I am not going to object. But I think I shall object to other bills providing for commemorative stamps, which may be brought forward one by one, and I should like to give such notice now. In fact, I think we should look to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, without any order of the Senate, to create some sort of procedure which will bring the whole thing into one package at the end of the session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired. The Senate is now operating under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object I wish to make it plain that, as a matter of fact, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service cannot prevent the Post Office Department from issuing commemorative stamps. The Postmaster General has full discretion. Last year, after the committee turned down two proposals for stamps, the Postmaster General issued them any way. That is the law.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator not think, however, there is congressional responsibility at least for those we do approve, and that when we approve 20 or 30 commemorative stamps in 12 months, it simply reduces the whole process to a fantastic degree?

Mr. LANGER. I agreed fully. We cannot solve the problem here unless we change the law, because the Postmaster General can go ahead and issue such stamps anyway.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I suggest to the Senator we can at least by our own procedure reach a concentrated result at the end of the session with respect to the commemorative stamps we recommend, so that we at least recognize our responsibility.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I do not understand, or did not hear, the explanation made by the Senator from Maryland as to the urgency of this particular measure.

Mr. O'CONOR. I said there is urgency, in our opinion, because of the fact that the celebration is to be observed within the next month or two, and that, inasmuch as all plans have been perfected by the chamber of commerce and by civic organizations at Annapolis, the home of the Naval Academy and St. Johns College, for the commemoration of the three hundredth founding, it is important the joint resolution be passed at this time in order that completed arrangements may be made.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I observe that Calendar No. 21, Senate bill 492, likewise relates to the issuance of a stamp commemorative of the two-hundredth anniversary of the founding of the city of Alexandria, Va. I am wondering whether or not in that case the Senator knows, or if either Senator from Virgina may advise me, whether or not there is a similar emergency.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, Alexandria is in exactly the same category as Annapolis. It is about to celebrate the two hundredth anniversary of its founding in 1749. Preparations are now being made for it. Alexandria is one of the most historic cities in America, as the Senator knows. It was George Washington's home, Robert E. Lee lived there, and among other things, the city was once a part of the District of Columbia. Preparations are now being made for the celebration in 1949, within 60 or 90 days.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I merely want to concur in everything the senior Senator from Michigan has said with reference to the issuance of stamps, here, there, and everywhere. The committee discussed the subject when these two measures came before it. It was thought under the circumstances, because Annapolis was at one time the Capital of the United States, that on its three hundredth anniversary, when a big celebration is to take place, it would be well to issue the stamps.

In regard to the stamp commemorative of the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the city of Alexandria, the senior Senator from Virginia has already expressed the reason why the committee favorably reported that bill. But I want to assure the Senate that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service in the future intends to take such matters up with the Post Office Department and obtain clearance before reporting similar measures to the floor of the Senate. That I believe will expedite matters in regard to this subject.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should think, under the Senator's statement and under the statement of the able Senator from Virginia, that these are two perfectly legitimate objectives. I am not going to object to either one, on the basis of the assurance of the able Senator that the committee will undertake some sort of rationalization in connection with other requests of this nature for the remainder of the session.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. This is not merely the statement of the chairman of the committee. The committee discussed the subject when the two measures were before it. We assure the Senate something will be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 22) to authorize the issuance of a special series of stamps commemorative of the three hundredth anniversary of Annapolis, Md., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to prepare for issuance in May 1949 a special series of 3-cent postage stamps, of such design as he shall prescribe, in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of Annapolis, Md.

MARCUS GEORGE VETERANS MEMORIAL HOSPITAL

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 372) to provide for the designation of the United States Veterans' Administration hospital in Americus, Ga., as the Marcus George Veterans Memorial Hospital.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words regarding this bill. I think it is a magnificent thing for the Senate to pass it and provide that the United States veterans' hospital in Americus, Ga., shall be known as the Marcus George Veterans Memorial Hospital. It is well known that Lieutenant George died a heroic death in the North Atlantic while endeavoring to rescue other aviators who were imperiled. Senators are more or less familiar with the account of his exploits and of his failure to return from the flight he was ordered to make.

I ask unanimous consent that the report of the Committee on Finance be printed in full in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the report (No. 29) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Education: University of Georgia.

Medals: American Defense Service Medal, Fleet Clasp, Purple Heart.

Died: Presumptive August 8, 1944. Officially reported to be missing in action as of August 7, 1943, when the plane which he was aboard was lost in the Atlantic area. In compliance with section 5 of Public Law 490, as amended, death is presumed to have occurred on the 8th day of August 1944.

Place: Atlantic area.

Cause: Plane lost (enemy action).

According to the records on file Lieutenant George was listed on the records of the Navy Department in the status of missing in action as of August 7, 1943. He was on board a plane which took off from the naval air station, New York, on an antisubmarine patrol flight. Several minutes after the plane took off, it was instructed by its base to proceed to position 37° 35′ north latitude and 71° 20′ west longitude, in order to investigate that area and to stand by a plane which had landed to pick up survivors of another plane which had been shot down by an enemy submarine. The last message received was an acknowledgment of the receipt of the above message. Weather conditions in the area at the time included excellent visibility and a calm sea with light swells. Extensive but unsuccessful search operations were conducted. Reports received state that the reason for the failure of the plane to return is unknown but its loss is believed to have been the result of enemy submarine gunfire.

The committee is in accord with the purposes of the bill and recommends its enactment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Lieutenant George was a son of our colleague the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], chairman of the Committee on Finance. The United States, through the Congress, does a most appropriate and gallant thing in making this public recognition of our admiration for Lieutenant George's heroism, his patriotism, and his great achievements in his chosen work.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proposed United States Veterans' Administration hospital at Americus, Ga., shall be known and designated on the public records as the Marcus George Veterans Memorial Hospital.

RECONVEYANCE OF LAND TO HELENA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The bill (S. 460) to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to reconvey to the Helena Chamber of Commerce certain described parcels of land in the city of Helena, Mont., was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that, in my judgment, the bill is an exceedingly meritorious one in that it does not violate the general principle in regard to the disposal of Federal property, which I in times past have sought to protect. But because controversy will undoubtedly arise in the future in connection with other transfers of Federal property, I wish to make a few comments on the pending bill.

As the committee's report shows, it relates to a piece of property, valued at between $10,000 and $15,000, which was transferred to the Veterans' Administration by the Helena Chamber of Commerce for the specific purpose of erecting on the property a Veterans' Administration regional office. The transfer was for that purpose, and that purpose only, with the reservation, of course, in the conveyance that if the property were not used for that purpose, it would revert to the Helena Chamber of Commerce. The committee report shows that it has now been decided that the property will not be used for the purpose originally intended, because the Veterans' Administration has agreed upon a consolidation program which will make possible the use of an office building in another vicinity. Therefore, under the terms of the conveyance itself, the Federal Government is not entitled to the retention of the property, and consequently the bill is a meritorious one.

I make that statement because I want to lay down the distinction between this case and cases which, I surmise, may arise in the future as they have in the past. So far as the junior Senator from Oregon is concerned, he will not give unanimous consent to making gifts of Federal property to cities, counties, and local governmental units of States without just compensation paid to the American taxpayers who own the property.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, in addition to what the Senator from Oregon has stated, I desire to say that the Federal Government has incurred no expense in the improvement of this property. The transfer will be made without cost to the Federal Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 460) was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized to reconvey by quitclaim deed to the Helena Chamber of Commerce, a corporation, two parcels of land in Helena, Mont., commonly designated as lot numbered 10 and the south 55 feet of lot numbered 9 of the Henry Thompson placer mining claim in Lewis and Clark County, Mont., which parcels were conveyed to the United States of America by the Helena Chamber of Commerce by deed dated February 7, 1947, and recorded among the land records of said county, in Book 140 of Deeds at page 63.

STAMP COMMEMORATIVE OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF FOUNDING OF ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The bill (S. 492) to amend the act approved June 29, 1948, entitled "An act to authorize the issuance of a stamp commemorative of the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the city of Alexandria, Va.," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved June 29, 1948, entitled "An act to authorize the issuance of a stamp commemorative of the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the city of Alexandria, Va.," be amended to read as follows:

"That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to issue, during 1949, a special 6-cent air-mail postage stamp, of such design as he shall prescribe, in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the city of Alexandria, Va."

REGULATION OF EXPORTS

The bill (S. 548) to provide for continuation of authority for the regulation of exports and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That bill is the unfinished business before the Senate, and will go over until later.

COTTON ACREAGE PLANTED IN 1949

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 128) to provide that acreage planted to cotton in 1949 shall not be used in computing cotton acreage allotments for any subsequent year, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That, notwithstanding the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, or of any other law, State, county, and farm acreage allotment for corn, wheat, cotton, and rice for any year after 1949 shall be computed and apportioned without regard to acreage planted, or to yields, in 1949.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is a House bill, dealing with cotton. When the bill came to the Senate committee, it was decided to include wheat, corn, and rice. The amendment provides that the acreage planted this year to the production of cotton, wheat, corn, and rice shall not be used in future years in computing the acreage applicable to any farmer.

The purpose of the bill is to discourage production after this year, for the reason that we now have a surplus of some 6,000,000 bales of cotton. The record shows approximately 300,000,000 bushels of wheat at the end of the year, and we shall also have a large supply of corn and a reasonable supply of rice. Having these large supplies on hand, it was the recommendation of the Department that we should not consider the acreage planted this year in computations for allotments for production and marketing.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, do I correctly understand from what the Senator has said that it will tend to cut down the amount of subsidies which the Government may be expected to pay?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Obviously so. The reason for this proposed legislation, as I understand and believe, is this: Farmers, knowing they will have a high support price for this year's acreage, 90 percent, believe they can plant and raise a large crop and get a higher support price. That is one reason. Another reason is that by an increase in their acreage they thought that perhaps they could increase their parity. So the bill is designed to curtail or eliminate those two points.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to add to what the Senator from Oklahoma has said, that when a quota of acreage is established it is usually on a historic basis as to what the particular producer has had over the years. The great increase in wheat and cotton acreage naturally would distort the quota.

I think it is highly desirable that some control be had over the acreage. Excluding this increase in acreage of cotton, and, to some extent, applying it to other production, is a desirable thing.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Would not the necessary effect be to result in more planting of cotton this year, 1949?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The cotton season has not started yet. Some has been planted in the Southern States. The reason for offering the bill is to serve notice officially on all cotton planters that they cannot have considered their acreage for this year.

Mr. TAFT. I see. It is to have the opposite effect.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary be authorized to correct the title to conform to the body of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE BUILDING

The bill (S. 713) to amend Public Law 533 of the Eightieth Congress authorizing the construction of a building for the General Accounting Office on square 518 in the District of Columbia, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of Public Law 533, Eightieth Congress, approved May 18, 1948, limiting the cost of the General Accounting Office Building to $22,850,000 be, and the same are hereby, amended to increase such limit of cost to $25,400,000.

REPEAL SECTION 509 OF TITLE 34, UNITED STATES CODE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 77) to repeal section 509 of title 34 of the United States Code, approved June 30, 1876 (ch. 159, 19 Stat. 69).

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to repeal an act passed by Congress in 1876, which prohibited the Navy Department from employing any person within 60 days of an election, unless the Secretary of the Navy issued a certificate that the employment was necessary, and the certificate was published. That statute is entirely archaic now, in view of the civil-service system, and other laws.

The bill S. 77 was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 509 of title 34 of the United States Code, approved June 30, 1876 (ch. 159, 19 Stat. 69), is hereby repealed.

DISPOSITION OF CERTAIN PERSONAL PROPERTY

The bill (S. 629) to authorize the disposition of certain lost, abandoned, or unclaimed personal property coming into the possession of the Treasury Department, the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, or the Department of the Air Force, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Air Force, respectively, are hereby authorized to dispose of by sale or otherwise, 1 year after date of receipt, all lost, abandoned, or unclaimed personal property which is now or may hereafter come into the possession, custody, or control of the Treasury Department, the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, or the Department of the Air Force, as the case may be: Provided, That an effort shall be made to determine and locate the owner or owners thereof, or their legal representatives, and that in all cases where the owner thereof, or legal representative, has been determined the property shall not be sold or otherwise disposed of for a period of 90 days after written notice has been sent to his last known address.

SEC. 2. The net proceeds received from the sale of any such property by the Treasury Department, the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, or the Department of the Air Force shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 3. Claims for the net proceeds, if any, of such property so disposed of may be filed with the General Accounting Office by the rightful owners or their legal representatives at any time prior to the expiration of 3 years from the date of the disposal of the property and, if not so filed, are barred from being acted on by either courts or the accounting officers.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Air Force, respectively, are authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes and provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. Any property coming within the provisions of this act which may be delivered to the Soldiers' Home under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Army or the Secretary of the Air Force shall be limited to papers of value, sabers, insignia, decorations, medals, watches, trinkets, manuscripts, or other articles valuable chiefly as keepsakes.

SEC. 6. This act shall not be construed as amending or repealing the act of March 29, 1918 (40 Stat. 499); article 112 of section 1, chapter 11, of the act of June 4, 1920 (41 Stat. 809); the act of February 21, 1931 (46 Stat. 1203); the act of December 28, 1945 (59 Stat. 662), as amended; or the act of August 2, 1946 (60 Stat. 846-847), as amended.

AGE LIMIT FOR APPOINTMENT IN SUPPLY CORPS

The bill (S. 630) to amend section 19 of the act of August 13, 1946 (60 Stat. 1057), so as to remove the upper age limit for appointment to commissioned grade in the Supply Corps of the Navy, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That section 19 of the act of August 13, 1946 (60 Stat. 1057), as amended, is hereby further amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 19. No person shall be appointed to a commissioned grade in the Supply Corps of the Navy who will be less than 21 years of age on July 1 of the calendar year in which appointed and until his physical, mental, and moral qualifications have been established to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy."

PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF OFFICERS OF THE NAVAL RESERVE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 673) relating to the pay and allowances of officers of the Naval Reserve performing active duty in the grade of rear admiral, and for other purposes.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I wonder if we may have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, this bill is reported by the committee in an effort to eliminate any injustice done certain Reserve officers of the Navy.

Rear admirals of the Navy for pay purposes are divided into the upper half and lower half. Those in the lower half numerically draw the same pay and allowances as a brigadier general of the Army while those in the upper half that of a major general.

Under a ruling of the Comptroller based on the wording of several laws, certain Reserve rear admirals on active duty cannot draw the pay of the upper half regardless of relative rank and length of service. This bill provides that a Reserve rear admiral on active duty will be entitled to upper-half pay when the Regular Navy rear admiral next junior to him draws upper-half pay. The immediate effect of this bill is that one Reserve rear admiral now on active duty will draw upper-half pay instead of lower-half. This difference in pay amounts to approximately $2,200 a year.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I shall not object. My purpose for asking an explanation was that during the war we found existing a situation in which Reserve officers would be commissioned as rear admirals, and it was never intended that Reserve officers, prior to the passage of the so-called Reserve Act, would be in the upper brackets, which were for men who had devoted their lives to the Navy and who were presumably more expert. We found men coming in from civilian life who would finally be rear admirals, and then they wanted to be in the upper brackets. Now that the component of the Navy is so large and we must rely on a great many Reserve officers who will probably make a career of the Navy to a much greater extent than heretofore, I suppose it is all right to allow them to get into the upper brackets.

Mr. RUSSELL. The bill involves only one, but I see no reason for discriminating against a reserve officer who is on active duty and serves for a long time, to the extent that he cannot under any circumstances get into the upper half. As it is now, the regular officers, the Annapolis graduates, who are rear admirals, can pass over the reserve officer and get into the upper half, and as it is now the reserve officer cannot under any circumstances get into the upper half and attain the rank of rear admiral. The bill applies to only one man, who is a specialist, and the Navy Department is very anxious to have it passed.

Mr. MAGNUSON. If the Reserve officers remain in the Navy long enough to become rear admirals, they should be a part of the Regular Navy.

Mr. RUSSELL. The man affected by the bill is a specialist, and, as I have said, the Navy Department is anxious that the bill should be passed. But I may say that for my part I have never been in favor of discriminating against a man because he is a Reserve officer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any officer of the Naval Reserve serving in the grade of rear admiral shall receive the pay and allowances prescribed by law for rear admirals of the upper half when any officer of the active list of the line of the Regular Navy, junior to him, is in the upper half of the list of rear admirals: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to officers of the Naval Reserve while on any lineal list established pursuant to title III of the Officer Personnel Act of 1947: Provided further, That no back pay or allowances shall be held to have accrued under the provisions of this act for any period prior to the date of its approval.

UPPER COLORADO RIVER BASIN COMPACT

The bill (S. 790) to grant the consent of the United States to the upper Colorado River Basin compact was announced as next in order.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over. My colleague, the senior Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], is out of the city on official business, and his office has requested that the bill go over. We certainly have no objection to early consideration of the proposed legislation, but we merely desire to be sure that there is nothing in the bill that will adversely affect the lower-basin waters.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I merely wish to state for the RECORD that the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs instructed its staff yesterday to advise the office of the senior Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] of the fact that the bill had been reported, so that if he desired to have it held up, he would be on notice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will be passed over. That completes the calendar.

REGULATION OF EXPORTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 548) to provide for continuation of authority for the regulation of exports, and for other purposes.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, the Committee on Banking and Currency has considered S. 548, has unanimously reported the bill, as amended, and has recommended that the bill do pass.

Exports of commodities from this country have been controlled by law since the power was first requested by President Roosevelt in 1940. From that time to the present this authority has been renewed periodically by the Congress. However, the nature, scope, and purposes of the controls exercised under it have been modified to meet the changing needs of the national interest.

In 1940 export controls were being used to strengthen the national defense. During the war they were used to prevent supplies from getting to our enemies and to direct goods to our fighting allies, while at the same time protecting our own scarce supplies.

Since the end of the war they have been used and at the present time they are being used, first, to cushion the domestic economy from the inflationary effects of abnormal foreign demand for some of our supplies which are still short; second, to direct such goods as we can spare to those countries where need is greatest and where world recovery will be speeded up; and finally, to check exports of industrial commodities which might affect our national security.

In other words, these controls are necessary now, and are being used, to protect the domestic economy by limiting exports of scarce materials, and to channel exports to countries where the need is greatest, and where our foreign policy and national security interests would be served best.

President Truman, in his State of the Union Message, emphasized the need for continuation of these controls, and asked for renewal of the present legislation, together with provisions for more adequate enforcement, which have been included in the pending bill. The testimony of the Secretary of Commerce, the Under Secretary of Agriculture, and other Government witnesses, as well as witnesses invited from the trade, who appeared before the Subcommittee on Small Business of the Banking and Currency Committee, was very convincing as to the need for maintaining export controls throughout this period of unsettled world affairs.

As pointed out in the committee report, a number of witnesses urged a shorter extension, of only 16 months, not because they questioned the need for the longer extension, but only in order to provide for an annual review by the Congress. Such a review is not precluded in S. 548. On the contrary, specific provision is made for quarterly reports to the Congress of operations thereunder, and for termination of the controls at any time by simple concurrent resolution. The evidence at this time is fairly clear as to the need for these controls for at least two years to come.

In this connection, it should also be observed that the Investigations Subcommittee of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments which had made an exhaustive survey of the program during the last Congress, stated in its report of December 18, 1948:

> The failure to maintain adequate export controls at this time can have extremely harmful effects upon our national security and domestic economy. The national security aspects of our export control program are of transcendent importance. * * * The economic phases of the export control program are also important.

Generally speaking, S. 548 makes no substantive changes from the present law. The legal authority is continued for the control of commodities, the licensing of specific exports, and the exercise of destination, end-use, price and other pertinent licensing standards and criteria to carry out the purposes of the bill.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question, or would he rather that I wait until he concludes his remarks?

Mr. MAYBANK. I have no objection to yielding.

Mr. BALDWIN. I notice in the committee report that the controls which the Senate is being asked to extend by the pending legislation, are substantially the same controls and continued in the same language by which they were continued in section 3 of the joint resolution of December 30, 1947. Was not that the so-called Anti-inflation Act which was passed in the fall of that year? And was not that section 3 of that act?

Mr. MAYBANK. That is correct. That was after certain items had been controlled. It was during the administration of President Roosevelt, in 1940, that these controls were begun. The controls became greater and greater during the war. In the year to which the Senator referred some decontrols were put into effect. They were considered at that time by the Committee on the Judiciary, by the Commerce Committee, and by other committees. The controls then dealt substantially with materials which were scarce at that time, and which apparently are scarce now.

Mr. BALDWIN. In other words, this is a continuation of section 3 of the act setting up anti-inflation measures adopted in a Republican-controlled Congress in December 1947. The other day we continued in force and effect section 2 of that act. Now we continue section 3.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BALDWIN. So, what we are asked to do now is to continue in force and effect a section 3 in substantially the same form as it was passed in a Republican-controlled Congress?

Mr. MAYBANK. After control had, of course, been commenced by President Roosevelt in 1940; yes.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. What is the justification for extending this control for 2 years and 3 months? Why is not 1 year enough? Why cannot we reasonably hope that a year from this time there will no longer be need for export control.

Mr. MAYBANK. I am very hopeful that it will not take a year. That is why we have the provision in the bill that the control can be ended by the adoption of a concurrent resolution at any time.

The principal additions to the present law are the provisions which are designed to improve enforcement of export controls. These are contained particularly in sections 3 and 6. The report of the investigations subcommittee, previously mentioned, pointed out the necessity for such a stronger compliance program. The President emphasized the need for strong enforcement measures, and the Secretary of Commerce has made a similar recommendation. In order to give effect to these recommendations, which are discussed more at length in the committee's report, specific authority is provided in this bill for undertaking all necessary enforcement measures.

The determination of what commodities shall be decontrolled and the fixing of export quotas have been delegated by the President to the Secretary of Commerce, but the decisions on such matters are made only after an extensive review by an interagency committee on which all interested departments are represented.

The committee felt that the Secretary of Agriculture should, because of his general responsibilities in the field of food and agriculture, be given final responsibility for determining the total amount of agricultural commodities, including fats and oils, which are in excess of our own needs and which could, accordingly, be authorized for export.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. As a matter of fact, I understand that the European prices for fats and vegetable oils are higher than those in the United States.

Mr. MAYBANK. The statement is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. We have a surplus of such fats and oils in the United States, and yet permission is not granted to export the surplus to Europe.

Mr. MAYBANK. I will say to the Senator from Texas that we have prepared an amendment, the purpose of which is to leave that matter entirely to the Secretary of Agriculture. I may say that the President himself spoke to the chairman of the House committee, Mr. SPENCE, and also to Representative BROWN, of Georgia. The Secretary spoke to me, authorizing me to say that he would not object to having the matter turned over to the Department of Agriculture.

I am glad the Senator from Texas is present on the floor of the Senate at this moment. I wish to say to him that I think the fats and oils situation, as the testimony will show, has in the past been handled miserably. We undertook a full investigation of that subject. I wish to call to the attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BALDWIN], who asked about similar language, that the law which permits the Secretary of Commerce to have a veto with respect to export of agricultural products is, to my way of thinking, all wrong. The price of cottonseed has gone down. The price of lard has gone down. As every western Senator knows, the price of soybeans has gone down. The latest figures we have received, since the hearings were closed, show that the price of soybeans is still declining. To illustrate, let me for a moment compare the prices of soybean oil and cottonseed oil at the beginning and end of last year. The price of soybean oil, for instance, in January 1948 was 26.6 cents. The price in December 1948 was 17.3 cents. The price of cottonseed oil in January 1948 was 28 cents as compared with 17.08 cents in December 1948. Last Thursday's quotation on cottonseed oil, crude in the valley, was 13.75.

I want the Senator from Texas, who has a wide knowledge of cotton and of agriculture, to help us, if he can, so far as ECA is concerned. The ECA has not bought sufficient cottonseed oil, nor has the ECA bought sufficient soybeans, nor has the ECA bought the inedible fats and the edible fats which are selling for almost nothing in this country, and which could be used, particularly in the region where General Clay has jurisdiction, as the testimony shows. The Senator is correct in his statement. This matter has been poorly handled. I hope it will be handled better under the Secretary of Agriculture. I hope the ECA will take an interest in the program. The farmers of the country are in dire need of such help.

Mr. CONNALLY. Has the Senator from South Carolina any assurance that if control of the matter should be placed under the Department of Agriculture it will be handled better than it is now?

Mr. MAYBANK. No; but that is the only suggestion that was made.

Mr. CONNALLY. The authority ought to be trimmed down quite materially before it is placed anywhere.

Mr. MAYBANK. We trimmed it down.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say a word respecting ECA. My information is that vegetable oils are selling in Europe for higher prices than they are selling for in the United States.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator, I believe, is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. So we could very easily help the objectives of the ECA by shipping more vegetable fats to Europe, and bringing down the price in Europe, rather than spending our money by paying the higher prices here at home.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator is eminently correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. I certainly hope the committee will do something to relieve the situation. The present policy seems to me to be foolish. It benefits no one.

Mr. MAYBANK. I may say to the Senator that inedible fats have already been decontrolled.

Mr. CONNALLY. Not entirely.

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. An allocation was made the other day for the first quarter of the year.

Mr. MAYBANK. No; inedible fats have been decontrolled.

Mr. CONNALLY. How about edible fats? Inedible fats cannot be eaten. If we are going to relieve Europe, we ought to give its people something they can eat. There is no use attempting to relieve them by giving them inedible fats, and leaving the edible fats under control.

Mr. MAYBANK. With respect to edible fats, additional allocations amounting to 35,000,000 pounds each of lard, cottonseed and soy beans, were issued last week. The Department is now considering the subject. I feel that as soon as authority is vested in the Department of Agriculture—it is vested in the Department of Commerce now——

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand.

Mr. MAYBANK. As soon as it is vested in the Department of Agriculture, I hope the Department will decontrol them.

The question is whether ECA could not render a great service by providing Europe with more inedible as well as edible fats, because, as the Senator says, ECA is paying higher prices for European fats than our farmers are receiving for theirs. Not only that, Mr. President, but the same situation is true with respect to Canada and South America.

Mr. CONNALLY. Speaking of edible fats, wholesome food needed by the people of Europe and by the people of all the world, we have now more of them than we need in the United States, and those in control of the exportation of such fats have placed a fence around them and will not permit them to be exported. The difficulty about vesting the authority in any of the Federal departments is that the Secretary himself cannot personally examine every application. The Secretary of Commerce receives 10,000 applications a week.

Mr. MAYBANK. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Some clerk in the Department smells around and secures reports. He knows nothing about inedible fats; he knows nothing about cottonseed oil; he knows nothing about soybean oil. He simply makes some sort of a calculation and fixes the quota that shall be allowed to go abroad.

Mr. MAYBANK. I am in thorough accord with the Senator. That is the reason why we talked with the President and were assured that the responsibility for the determination of export quotas, exportable surpluses of agricultural commodities would be turned over to the Department of Agriculture. That is the reason for the amendment. I intend to follow it up to the limit of my ability as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, and I feel certain that my good friend, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, will help us out with ECA.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will help the Senator and his committee if they will do their part. It is proposed to turn the administration of this subject over to the Department of Agriculture. If that is done, I hope that the Secretary of Agriculture will be fully informed as to what has transpired.

Mr. MAYBANK. I talked with him only this morning.

Mr. CONNALLY. That will do no good unless the Senator talks with him tonight and tomorrow and the following night, and the next day and the next night.

Mr. MAYBANK. At least, he will be responsible.

Mr. CONNALLY. What does that amount to? The Secretary of Commerce is now responsible, but what does it amount to? All it amounts to is that we rise in the Senate and make little speeches, and that is the end of it.

Mr. MAYBANK. I do not agree with the Senator in that respect. We listened to more than a week of testimony. I feel that agricultural products do not belong under the Department of Commerce, and have no place there.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think it would be helpful to the discussion to point out to the senior Senator from Texas that we were informed that the allocations of edible fats and oils are not being taken up at the present time. The export licenses are not consuming all the allocations available. So it would make little difference if the controls were removed.

Mr. MAYBANK. The trouble is the great shortage of dollars outside this country.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. It will not do any harm if they cannot buy the goods and pay for them. No one will be hurt. But if the products are dammed up and cannot be exported, our own producers are hurt.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator was eminently correct as the situation existed last fall. What went on was outrageous. But since the present Congress has been in session both inedible and edible fats and oils have been available. Since we held the hearings quotas have been increased to the point where we are informed that they cannot all be taken up.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I merely wish to confirm what the distinguished chairman of the committee has said about the zeal with which we went into the subject. On the Committee on Banking and Currency there are members who are not bankers. Some of them come nearer to being farmers than bankers. We are very much interested in what affects the farmer. We went into the subject very fully. We feel that we have amended the language of the bill so as to protect the situation. We have the assurance of the President, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce that the intent and purpose of this amendment will be carried out.

I wish further to say to my distinguished colleague from Texas that we shall make it our business to keep in touch with this problem, to see that there are no unnecessary restrictions, red tape, or delays which will result in banking up unconsumable surpluses of edible and inedible fats and oils in this country.

On the first of March a new allocation quota will go into effect. The authorities are now at work liberalizing the quota with a view to moving all the accumulated surpluses for which there are proper markets. I feel that no Member of the Senate need have any uneasiness about the steps we have taken and plan to take to protect the producer, the processor, and the distributor of fats and oils in this country.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR. Does the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency feel that the main reason for keeping allocations and export licenses is to control the destination of edible fats and oils, and to keep them from going to certain countries? As I understand, that is the only reason for keeping controls at this time.

Mr. MAYBANK. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that I understood that some of the controls are designed to keep certain products from going to certain countries. However, I do not believe that was the chief reason for keeping fats and oils under control. I have heard that the only reason why edible fats were selling at such high prices in Europe was that they were being held back here. Why should our farmers be punished and have their goods stocked up in this country when there is a shortage in Europe, and fats and oils are bringing such high prices? As the Senator knows, inedible fats go largely into soaps and products of that kind.

Mr. TAYLOR. But that is not true of edible fats. If the purpose is not to control the destination, then I am at a loss to see any reason for retaining controls.

Mr. MAYBANK. In my opinion there should be no controls on edible fats and oils. As the Senator knows, during our hearings, the allotments on lard, cottonseed oil, and soybean oil were increased by 35,000,000 tons a quarter. The Senator also knows that because of the facts which we brought out with respect to inedible fats, the price of soap was reduced a few cents by the soap manufacturers of the country who have been stocking up on much of the inedible fats at sacrifice prices.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to make a brief statement. Export controls certainly do not promote trade and commerce, so far as the sale of our own products is concerned. Red tape and delay certainly militate against the rapid and orderly carrying on of trade and commerce. These controls have been extended for a period of more than 2 years, and they seem to me to be wholly unnecessary. It is not the policy of the United States to use export controls except under certain emergency situations.

Mr. MAYBANK. That is what the law provides.

Mr. GEORGE. The general policy of the United States is to do away with export controls, tariff restrictions, exchange restrictions, and all other restrictive measures which impede commerce. There is no doubt that any exporter in this country must go through certain red tape procedure in order to obtain a permit. All such restrictions operate against the rapid passing into trade of our own products. Here the emphasis is placed upon oil, and that is important.

Mr. MAYBANK. It was emphasized only because the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] had asked specifically about oils.

Mr. GEORGE. The amendment itself emphasizes fats and oils. It provides as follows:

(c) The authority conferred by this section shall not be exercised with respect to any agricultural commodity, including fats and oils, during any period for which the supply of such commodity is determined by the Secretary of Agriculture to be in excess of the requirements of the domestic economy, except to the extent required to effectuate the policies set forth in clause (b) or clause (c) of section 2 hereof.

I presume that all vegetable and animal fats and oils must receive attention from the Secretary of Agriculture if this bill is passed.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. GEORGE. But there are other agricultural products, as the Senator from South Carolina well knows, which are not absolutely prohibited from entering interstate and foreign commerce under the present law. I refer, for example, to naval stores. However, the red tape and the long delays involved make it quite impossible to export them. There would seem to be very little reason for continuing these export controls, which are contrary to the general policy which this country has followed for a long time. Such controls should not be used except in case of necessity.

Let me invite the Senator's attention to a further fact. It would be quite impossible, I believe, for anyone except an international trader to do much trading in a commodity such as cotton.

Mr. MAYBANK. I agree.

Mr. GEORGE. He must make his quotations, but he does not know how long it will be before he will get a permit to enable him to export. It is pretty difficult for him to protect himself.

Mr. MAYBANK. That question was discussed over a period of 1 or 2 days with Dr. McIntyre. He is the Assistant Director of OIT. I believe the hearings will show that the procedure has been expedited and that at the present time it is being handled satisfactorily. Even those who had been opposed to it testified that it had been greatly improved in the past 2 months.

Mr. GEORGE. No doubt it has been greatly improved; but the point I am making is that a continuation of export controls necessarily will hamper, to some extent and in some way, our foreign trade.

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. So the controls should not be extended, in my opinion, 1 day beyond the actual necessity.

Mr. MAYBANK. Of course, by concurrent resolution the Congress can do away with the controls. However, the Senator will admit, I am sure, that some commodities, such as steel and other very scarce articles, including manganese, must be controlled.

Mr. GEORGE. I suppose there are yet some scarce articles. However, my observation is that the pipe lines in this country are filling up.

Mr. MAYBANK. I agree.

Mr. GEORGE. And we are approaching a period when surpluses are ahead of us—in many lines, at least.

Mr. MAYBANK. That is the situation as regards cotton, wheat, corn, and other commodities; and that is why declines have occurred. But I say to the Senator from Georgia that there are scarcities of strategic metals and minerals, the list of which is printed in the hearings.

Mr. GEORGE. I think there should always be export control of critical and strategic metals and minerals. But our policy with respect to ordinary commerce and trade certainly should be one of complete liberty and freedom, and not one of restrictions. So, to continue this act for 2 years and 3 months strikes me as too long a time. I would much rather vote for it if it would continue controls for only 1 year.

It is true, as the Senator has said, that Congress can get rid of it by concurrent resolution, but it is very difficult to get Congress to act, sometimes. Once a law is placed on the statute books, it tends to remain there. Something in the nature of inertia often affects the Congress in that respect, and we do not move very fast.

Mr. MAYBANK. I say to the Senator from Georgia what I said at the hearings, namely, that I have reference to a long list—some three pages in extent—of strategic and critical materials and metals, including soil pipe made of cast iron, and so forth.

Mr. GEORGE. I agree that there should be some control of strategic materials; but in peacetime I think controls should be removed from ordinary commerce as rapidly as possible.

Mr. MAYBANK. I agree.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question, if the Senator will yield to me.

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Is it not true that under the bill the Department of Commerce will be able to decontrol any commodity which it sees fit to decontrol?

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Is it not also true that the Department has already decontrolled fats and oils?

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes; and also lumber.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Is it not also true that last year, when the Congress was asked to appropriate more than $5,000,000,000 for aid to the Marshall plan countries, the charge was made that the expenditure of that sum of money abroad would have an inflationary effect upon our economy, and is it not said that this export control is merely an over-all attempt in foreign policy to aid the countries of Europe and at the same time to avoid a serious effect in regard to items which might be in short supply in this country?

Mr. MAYBANK. That is correct.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Does not the Senator from South Carolina also agree that, with world development and as the possibility of peace becomes more nearly a reality, the sooner we can drop all these controls the better it will be?

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes. I do not know how many commodities have already been decontrolled, but I know a large number of commodities have been.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Of course, no one would contend that such controls do not hamper and restrict and to some extent burden foreign commerce, but certainly not so much as it was claimed a little sawmill in the mountains of Virginia burdened interstate commerce under the wage-and-hour bill, because apparently anything anyone does nowadays will burden interstate commerce.

However, these restrictions do have some burdening effect; and naturally we shall urge, insofar as we have the privilege of doing so, the dropping of all export controls on items that are not vital in our over-all policy.

Mr. MAYBANK. Of course, the extreme scarcity of so many of these articles is, as the Senator from Virginia knows, what has caused high prices.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. As the Senator from South Carolina knows, I personally would favor going further into the matter of decontrols than this amendment does.

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes; I talked with the Senator yesterday.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I am constrained not to object too much to this amendment, because I think perhaps it is the best decontrol provision we can obtain. But I wish to call the attention of the Senator to one provision of subsection (c), on page 3, which is the decontrol amendment on fats and oils.

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes; it is the farm amendment.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the particular language there, which is a requirement that the Secretary of Agriculture make an affirmative finding of the existence of a surplus. Did the Senator or did the committee consider language which would provide that the decontrols would not apply unless the Secretary of Agriculture were to make an affirmative finding that there was not sufficient amount of the commodity in this country to meet the demand?

Mr. MAYBANK. We did not. No; that was never brought up in the committee, I may say to the Senator.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Under this amendment, the Senator from South Carolina and I might agree among ourselves that there was an excess supply. The price might and many other factors might indicate it. But if we could not get the Secretary of Agriculture to make an affirmative finding of the existence of a surplus, the commodity would still be under controls.

I wonder whether it would be better to provide that the commodity would be removed from controls unless the Secretary of Agriculture made an affirmative finding of the existence of a short supply in this country. Of course it is a difficult matter to phrase.

Mr. MAYBANK. I understand the Senator's point of view, and we discussed it yesterday. However, that point was not discussed in the committee.

The amendment which is now set forth was thoroughly discussed in the committee, and I am hopeful that it will be adopted.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I am in thorough agreement with the statements heretofore made to the effect that the objective must be to get rid of controls as quickly as possible and to return to a balanced economy. But I think the objection in the past to most of the controls has arisen from the fact that the Department of Agriculture might say, "We would like to decontrol this commodity, but the Department of Commerce will not agree, and we must obtain their consent," and the Department of Commerce might say, "We would like to decontrol this commodity, but we cannot obtain the consent of the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator is entirely correct; that was the testimony.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. However, this amendment represents an improvement, because it would fix the responsibility in one agency.

Personally, the amendment would appeal more to me if it provided for the decontrol of agricultural commodities, and only permitted controls to be imposed when the Secretary of Agriculture, acting under his own responsibility, said, "We do not have enough in this country to go around. Therefore I will reimpose export controls." I would feel better if the amendment read that way, rather than the way it does. Nevertheless, I believe the amendment constitutes a forward step.

Mr. MAYBANK. I appreciate the Senator's position, and I can understand from his remarks just the way he feels about the matter. I say to him that we did not discuss the so-called negative approach.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. In other words, I believe we had better take the view of keeping the economy going and letting the public official take the responsibility of closing it down, rather than of closing down the economy and then letting the public official on his own responsibility say it should be opened up. I think an important matter of public policy is involved in that connection.

However, I shall not oppose the amendment. I have no amendment to offer at this time. I believe this will substantially accomplish what the Senator is seeking.

Mr. MAYBANK. I appreciate what the Senator has said. I hope at least this step forward will not permit any such situation to exist again in the United States as has existed in the South and West during the past three months with respect not only to fats and oils, edible and inedible, but soybeans and their by-products, as well as cotton. The amendment we just discussed will, I believe, go a long way to prevent any such similar situation from developing.

Mr. President, your committee was particularly concerned and carefully looked into the effect of the export control program upon small business. It should be noted that specific provision is made in this bill, section 4 (b), that in granting licenses for export, consideration shall be given to the interests of small and merchant exporters among others. Provision is also made that there shall be trade consultation with respect to the determination of licensing practices and standards.

In this connection your committee noted with approval that the Department of Commerce had announced sometime ago, in its order providing for the establishment of trade advisory groups, that it will be governed by the principles announced in Senate Concurrent Resolution 14, Eightieth Congress, regarding small business. The committee was also furnished with information indicating the distribution of licenses in a number of commodities among small business, merchant exporters, and new exporters, and was generally impressed that by and large a fair distribution had been made. It was further noted that it was chiefly due to present-day abnormal conditions in foreign trade that small-business men were having difficulty in obtaining a larger share of export business.

Your committee was also concerned to determine how export controls have affected the farmers. During our hearings evidence was presented as to the growing surpluses of inedible and edible fats and oils and the serious drop in their prices. Accordingly, action was taken by the Department of Commerce to decontrol inedible fats and oils for export, and to authorize larger export quotas for cottonseed and soybean oils and also lard.

I ask to have inserted in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks the releases issued by the Department of Commerce giving the larger quotas and decontrolling certain articles, while our hearings were under way.

There being no objection, the releases were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RELEASE FROM UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE, OFFICE OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Controls will be removed effective February 7 from the export of most inedible fats and oils, the Department of Commerce announced today through its Office of International Trade.

Among the inedible fats and oils removed from the positive list of goods requiring specific licenses for export are all soaps, flaxseed, linseed oil, fish oil, olive-oil foots, inedible tallows and greases, stearic acid, oleic acid, neat's-foot oil, fatty acids of vegetable origin, vegetable-oil foots, and soap stock. These products were decontrolled because of generally improved supplies. United States prices of these products are lower than they have been at any time since the removal of OPA price ceilings and the prospects for increased production during the next half year are good.

OIT officials pointed out that existing regulations governing all shipments to Europe remain in effect for these commodities.

RELEASE FROM DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Supplemental export allocations totaling 105,000,000 pounds of edible fats and oils for the January–March quarter of 1949 were announced today by the Production and Marketing Administration of the United States Department of Agriculture. These allocations consist of 35,000,000 pounds each of cottonseed oil, soybean oil, and lard.

Department officials stated that the allocations announced today have been made possible by the availability of somewhat larger supplies of edible fats and oils than had been anticipated when the first quarter of 1949 allocations were determined. Production of lard and butter has been larger than expected, and domestic disappearance of edible fats and oils in general has been somewhat smaller. Specific information on domestic disappearance and January 1 stocks of edible fats and oils was made available by the Bureau of the Census on January 28. The increased availability of edible fats and oils makes it possible to meet more of the continuing needs abroad.

United States production of edible fats and oils for the current crop year ending September 30, 1949, is estimated to be about 550,000,000 pounds larger (7 percent) than the 7,170,000,000 pounds produced in 1947–48. Export allocations for edible fats, oils, and oilseeds issued to date for the period October 1948–March 1949 (including the allocations announced today) total 729,000,000 pounds, oil equivalent, compared with 425,000,000 pounds allocated during the corresponding period in 1947–48.

The following table shows in thousands of pounds, the distribution by countries, and type of procurement of the allocations announced today:

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, among other things, the export controls aided farmers with respect to our supplies of farm needs, seeds, fertilizers, barbed wire, baling wire, binder twine, jute and burlap bags, and milk cans, have been protected through export controls. If the rest of the world had free access to the United States market, it is clear that farmers would have had to pay more for their supplies and operate with smaller quantities.

Export controls have further benefited farmers by reducing exports of materials they buy in competition with other consumer groups. Examples of these are petroleum products, steel products, electrical equipment, and some machinery, the supplies of which are allocated for export with due regard for the needs of the farmer and other consumers.

For a program that is so complicated; that affects in such a direct way the financial interests of so many exporters; that affects the economic and social welfare of every country in the world; I must say that I, and I believe I speak for the membership of the committee, was impressed with the fact that the complaints and the criticisms were comparatively few and of relatively small consequence. I am confident that with the experience already gained by the Office of International Trade and with the benefit of the review our Subcommittee on Small Business intends to provide, we can look forward with confidence to a, sound intelligent, and efficient administration of this program, which is so important to the welfare and peace of the world.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the pending bill is the first of the bills which continue certain of the controls which were imposed during the war and which have since been continued. Last year, I supported the bill to extend export controls, and I am willing, rather reluctantly, to support the pending bill. I feel very strongly that the general policy of controlling exports and imports is a mistake, that it interferes with foreign trade and with the initiative of men to develop American industry, as well as foreign industry. Whether it is exercised by the Department of Commerce or by the Department of Agriculture, a great deal of red tape is involved in the process. A man who tries to make a contract with somebody abroad to sell him something cannot be certain he will be able to get a license.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Allow me to say that, in the main, I agree with the Senator in his views, but does he not think there should be an exception made in the case of strategic materials necessary for our security and national defense? We exerted ourselves during the war, and before the war, spending millions of dollars to acquire such materials. The necessity for acquiring them continues.

Mr. TAFT. I do not quite agree as to the Senator's statement regarding strategic materials, because we are dealing with them.

Mr. CONNALLY. I withdraw my agreement to the Senator's general principles, then.

Mr. TAFT. Yes; I understand. I am not going to oppose the enactment of the pending bill, although in the case of strategic materials we are asked this year to give $550,000,000 or more to the Army and Navy for the purpose of enabling them to accumulate the strategic materials they need. I feel sure they certainly are able, by and through the general voluntary allocation power we have given, to get the proper allocation of domestically produced materials.

I merely want to emphasize the fact that the application of controls is a check on the economic development of all countries. I was in Europe in November and December, when, as a matter of fact, international trade hardly existed in the sense even that it exists here, because of the restrictions upon imports and exports being so tight. Every country in Europe is trying to increase its exports and decrease its imports. The controls are so strict that a man in Europe simply cannot buy something where he finds it cheap, and try to sell it where he can make a reasonable profit on the sale, because he is subject to so many restrictions that he simply cannot undertake such an activity. His operations are so involved in restrictions that he cannot do it.

A typical example of the condition may be found in Holland, for instance. The purpose of their controls is to get more goods exported, which is the particular thing they desire to bring about. If one goes to Holland and tries to buy china to take to his home in another country, the people in the stores say, "The restrictions are so great, and it is so difficult, that unless you carry this china in your hand with you, we doubt if we ever can get it to you from here, either to the steamer in France or to the United States." Every country in Europe is operating in a kind of water tight compartment. I feel very strongly that as soon as we can get rid of that condition, we should get rid of it.

My principal reason for hesitating to oppose the pending bill is our situation with regard to Russia. There may be many things that should not be shipped, not only to Russia, but perhaps to other countries to be reshipped to Russia. So long as that situation exists, I do not like to oppose a bill giving the power. Yet I hope the Administration will remove controls from everything possible, everything that does not have some direct bearing on national defense.

I think the first reason given for enactment of the bill is hardly justified, except perhaps as to a very few materials. I refer to the argument with respect to protecting the domestic economy against an excessive drain of scarce materials, and reducing the inflationary impact of abnormal foreign demand. That was a very good reason a year ago. In 1946 there was a total export surplus of approximately $3,000,000,000. We were exporting $3,000,000,000 worth of goods and services more than we were importing. In 1947 approximately $11,000,000,000 more goods and services were exported than were imported. They did not all go to Europe, by any means. In the second quarter of 1947 there was an extraordinary export period in which we exported at the rate of $13,000,000,000 worth of goods in excess of imports, more than half of it going to countries outside Europe. That particular situation has come to an end rapidly. The truth is, the rest of the world has exhausted the dollars they accumulated during the war. They have exhausted the power to buy goods here and thereby acquire dollars.

The President's Economic Report for January says:

> The only major component of the Nation's economic budget which did not increase between 1947 and 1948 was net foreign investment; it declined from 8.9 billion dollars to approximately 1.8 billion. Net foreign investment represents the portion of our excess of exports over imports of goods and services that is financed by loans and investments and by net liquidation of foreign dollar assets and gold. It does not include the portion financed by grants, gifts and other unilateral transfers made by the United States Government and by private citizens.

So the total export surplus has dropped down from $11,000,000,000 in 1947 to $6,500,000,000 in 1948. In 1949 it may well be reduced further. So the situation now is that we are in balance, except to the extent that under the ECA we finance 5 or 6 billions dollars' worth of exports. Of course, so far as those exports are concerned, the ECA has the power to say what they shall be. It has the power to say whether they shall include short-supply commodities, such as steel. One great difficulty is that persons who wish to export must procure a license from the Department of Commerce, and practically a license from the ECA, so that the ordinary small-business man says, "What is the use? Let us sell this stuff in America and not try to do any export business."

I am willing to vote for the bill, but I do think that the administration should take export controls from everything from which it can possibly remove them. So far as I am concerned, at the present time, except for a few things I think controls should be removed from everything except those affected by the situation which now exists in relation to Russia.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. Is it not the Senator's judgment that the lack of dollar credits and the lack of dollars in Europe will militate against our exports? The only way we can help them at all is through ECA. Is not that correct? The tight economy in Europe is caused by the lack of dollars, or by a limited amount of dollars, perhaps I should say.

Mr. TAFT. It is caused by the fact that today there is no reserve. They have used it. They do not seem to be making articles that can be exported. But from the rest of the world we are buying more goods in dollars than we have ever bought before in the history of the United States. I think our imports amount to approximately $8,000,000,000 or $9,000,000,000. I have the figures somewhere, but I cannot refer to them at the moment. The large imports result in the rest of the world having $8,000,000,000 or $9,000,000,000 which they can use to buy our goods. It is not as if there were a dearth of dollars. We are doing our share by importing a tremendous amount of goods from all over the world. We are dealing through the ECA. Except for the Russian situation, the question of what shall be exported, it seems to me, might be left to such control as is exercised by the ECA. Persons who are able to do so are selling us goods. The use of preexisting dollars, which they were using 2 or 3 years ago, is coming to an end.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from South Carolina a question. Before I do so I should like to say that inasmuch as the distinguished Senator from Ohio has expressed generally my views on the bill which is now being considered, it is unnecessary for me to make a statement. I also was in Europe. It was my feeling, when I was there on two or three different occasions, that the Department of Commerce was not sensitive to the impacts of commitments which we had over there, not only those that raised prices but those that lowered prices, and relief was not given in many instances as quickly as it should have been given.

Mr. MAYBANK. That is my understanding.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator spoke of decontrolling inedible fats. In the Small Business Committee there has been request after request from rendering plants with reference to that subject. There will be a terrific loss of livestock in the Western States where inedible fats can be processed and used. There has been such a quantity that the price of lard, which was as high as $30 a hundred pounds, is already down to $11 a hundred pounds. Now there comes a terrific amount of fats that might be processed as inedible, which should be decontrolled. The question has been taken up with the Department of Commerce time and time again. Today I received a statement from the Department of Commerce. I suppose the Senator from South Carolina is well aware of it. Only this past week an order was issued which will become effective, I believe, today. All the inedible greases and tallows have been completely deallocated and can be shipped without license to any place in the world. Is that correct?

Mr. MAYBANK. I am not certain whether these products can be shipped to any place in the world.

Mr. WHERRY. When was that order issued?

Mr. MAYBANK. When the Senator was absent, last week.

Mr. WHERRY. It was effective yesterday, was it not?

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. I approve the order. The President had the power to delegate authority to the Secretary of Commerce. If that department had been more sensitive to the situation at home, possibly we could haxe exported some of the surplus.

I desire to ask: Is the reason for placing the operation of this proposed legislation in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture because the Senator feels, or the administration feels, that the Department of Agriculture will be more sensitive to our domestic economy in helping to facilitate exports under decontrol, or vice versa?

Mr. MAYBANK. I cannot answer as to what reason the administration may have. I think it would be better to place the authority in the Department of Agriculture than in the Department of Commerce. When the Department of Commerce had a veto, it was always passing from one Department to the other. The Senator knows my feelings on farm matters. I think this is a step forward.

Mr. WHERRY. That is really the purpose, I take it, for the Secretary of Agriculture's being included under congressional authority to carry out the provisions of the bill. I am not speaking for the administration, but I interpret the administration as feeling that the Secretary of Agriculture is acquainted at all times with the situation and is close to it, and that Department will be more sensitive to the impact on our domestic economy, either of high prices or low prices, and therefore orders will be put into effect probably more quickly than has been done, not only to alleviate shortages but also long supplies.

Mr. MAYBANK. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. With respect to the orders issued by the Department of Agriculture, I wish to say that, speaking for the Small Business Committee, I feel it is a step in the right direction. Certainly we are going to be confronted with a surplus of fats and oils in the low brackets so that it will hardly pay to transport them unless some provision is made to see that they are sold and something is done to help the producers who are now going to have such an impact upon them.

Mr. MAYBANK. I may add to what the Senator has said that I brought this matter to the attention of the committee before I was chairman of the committee. I make no criticism of the committee; the matter was handled I think wonderfully well. I am hopeful that there will be no repetition of what has happened.

Mr. WHERRY. One more question.

Paragraph (c) of section 3, the amendment we have been discussing, reads as follows:

(c) The authority conferred by this section shall not be exercised with respect to any agricultural commodity including fats and oils, during any period for which the supply of such commodity is determined by the Secretary of Agriculture to be in excess of the requirements of the domestic economy, except to the extent required to effectuate the policies set forth in clause (b) or clause (c) of section 2 hereof.

If the Senator will bear with me and refer to section 2, I should like to ask a question or two about that, especially since the Senator from Ohio has said on the floor that exports could be sent to any country in the world, including Russia. What do clauses (b) and (c) provide?

Mr. MAYBANK. I did not understand the Senator from Ohio to say what the Senator has just repeated.

Mr. WHERRY. Perhaps I am mistaken. I will ask, then, Does this amendment provide that the exports of fats, or whatever the Secretary may determine, exports of items which are decontrolled, can be shipped to any country in the world?

Mr. MAYBANK. Not necessarily.

Mr. WHERRY. What are clauses (b) and (c) on page 2, in section 2, intended to provide? I suppose ECA operates only in the countries which are parties to the program.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. What about the other countries, the satellite countries? The Senator remembers the long debate we had one afternoon during the consideration of the ECA bill, when some of us asked whether or not it would be possible to furnish the satellite countries with materials.

Mr. MAYBANK. I may say that when materials are completely decontrolled, so far as I know they can go to any country.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. FLANDERS. As I understand, clause (b) relates to such conditions as the administration desires to retain control of in connection with American exchange furnished the 16 countries by ECA. It leaves the administration with some control over what that American exchange shall be used for. Clause (c) of course relates——

Mr. WHERRY. It relates to the stock piling, does it not?

Mr. FLANDERS. For instance, suppose we furnish dollars to France, we will say, and France desires to buy a quantity of goods which we do not think are necessary for her recovery. We want to keep control of the dollars.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator is correct; we desire to keep control over the dollars.

Mr. WHERRY. I am going further than dollars. I should like to ask either of the Senators whether the Department of Agriculture has control in any way over scarce materials or surplus materials which are sent out of the country without any control at all. Do we say to what countries they shall go?

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator said "scarce materials." When fats and oils are decontrolled, I do not know any law against that.

Mr. FLANDERS. If a thing is decontrolled, it is decontrolled.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand that, but what I am asking is, even though it is decontrolled, does the Government still have any jurisdiction over it, any right to impose a prohibition in regard to it?

Mr. FLANDERS. No.

Mr. WHERRY. Are we to assume that, in regard to any of the surplus fats and oils, they can be shipped to any country in the world, including Russia.

Mr. MAYBANK. No, I have just reread the release of the Department of Commerce on the decontrol of inedible fats and oils, and I note that they are careful to point out "that existing regulations governing all shipments to Europe remain in effect." In other words shipments of any inedible fats and oils to Russia, or its satellites would still be subject to control. So they are not really completely decontrolled.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. In clause (c), section 2, page 2, line 10, the language is "to exercise the necessary vigilance over exports from the standpoint of their significance to the national security." That gives the administration the right, if it cares to exercise it, to refuse to ship any fats and oils to Russia or to any other country, if our security might be affected.

Mr. WHERRY. I appreciate the observation made by the distinguished Senator from Indiana. My interpretation of that provision is that it refers to control over dollar exports, and also that it has to do with stock piling in the interest of national security.

I do not know that the question I have raised is very highly important, because certainly in carrying out international responsibilities, no doubt what is covered in the bill will be done. But I go back to the argument made here 2 years ago when the question was asked, What are we to do with these materials; are the satellite countries to get them; are we going to let them finally get to countries which are endangering the peace? We finally get back to the question of peace, and keeping the peace is what ECA is for. It seems to me that when the Government is decontrolling, it should step into the picture and say that fats and oils which are desperately needed across the water shall find their way into the hands of friendly countries under ECA, and others to which we want them to go, and not go to the satellite countries, which might export them to Russia. In view of what Senator Maybank has said I assume this type of control can be maintained.

Mr. MAYBANK. I agree with the Senator.

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND POLICIES

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, 2 years ago I read into the RECORD a portion of an editorial from the London Economist of August 28, 1945, which warned the victor powers that "There is no other cure for the German sore on the body of Europe than to heal it."

I might say, Mr. President, that the people of the Middle West, and of some States such as New Jersey and California, were vitally interested in what the London Economist of that date had to say. Here was a newspaper which could not possibly be charged with being biased in favor of Germany.

The editorial went on to say in firm and prophetic words:

> The conviction that the peace proposal at Potsdam is a thoroughly bad peace is not based on any sentimental softening toward Germany. It is based upon belief that the system proposed is unworkable. It offers no hope of ultimate German reconciliation. It offers little hope of the Allies maintaining its cumbrous controls beyond the first years of the peace. Its methods of reparations reinforce autarchy in Russia and consummate the ruin not only of Germany but of Europe. Above all it has in it not a single constructive idea.

Mind you, Mr. President, this is the London Economist, one of the leading newspapers of England, which says:

> Above all it has in it not a single constructive idea, not a single hopeful perspective for the postwar world. At the end of the mighty war to defeat Hitlerism the Allies are making a Hitlerian peace.

Mr. President, I bring up this matter because these prophetic words have merely confirmed the futility of the policies we have been following in central Europe, and the necessity for the American Government now earnestly to reorient its policies on the basis of the obvious truth that "the only way to cure the German sore on the body of Europe is to heal it." It must be clear now to the American people that there can be no hope of peace whatever, until this Government abandons its role of a hate-happy hangman and restores some semblance of sanity to our relation with the vanquished peoples in central Europe.

Mr. President, I know of no more urgent or crucial problem confronting the American people, and crying for solution, than this problem of how we shall abandon the role we are continuing to play in this victor-and-vanquished drama.

Is it not all the more astounding then, Mr. President, to find that on January 20 President Truman in his inaugural address, deliberately omitted—I say it was done deliberately—any reference whatsoever to this crucial problem. Mind you, Mr. President, he omitted it after he had been told by his various military leaders that Germany was our first line of defense in any war with Russia. He omitted it after it had been made plain by the military leaders and by the various leaders of churches that it was most important to save Germany from communism. President Truman did deal with five specific matters including communism, the United Nations, our program for world economic recovery, the North Atlantic pact and his "bold new plan" for raising the standards of living of all the freedom-loving people around the world.

Again, Mr. President, let me call attention to the fact that any hope whatever of achieving any constructive solution to the problems involved in putting these five programs into effect is absolutely dependent upon, and inseparable from, our healing of the German sore on the European body politic. But the President did not one single time mention this most important problem during his entire inaugural address.

The President's deliberate omission of any mention of this most pressing problem is obvious for two reasons. The first I shall refer to but briefly, with the intention of dealing with it in great detail in the near future. It is the glaring contradiction between the President's professed desire to raise the standards of living of impoverished freedom-loving peoples around the world and the economic insanity which is involved in the policy he is continuing to pursue in Germany, 3 years after the end of hostilities.

The President cannot reconcile, nor can any Senator on the other side of the aisle reconcile, what the administration has done on the one hand and what it is continuing to do on the other.

For his bold new program he is asking $1,000,000,000 to make available skilled engineering and scientific personnel to undeveloped agrarian peoples. Yet, at the same time, he is spending $1,000,000,000 a year carrying out that murderous blueprint for destruction called the Morgenthau plan, which calls for exactly the opposite policy, namely, for the pastorilization of one of the most highly industrialized nations on earth. Could anything be more savage or moronic, Mr. President, than for this Government to proclaim to the world out of one side of its mouth "a bold new program" for developing the industrial capacity and standards of living of the undeveloped agricultural nations of the world and then, at the same time, to demand that those nations which have become highly industrialized nations, upon which Europe is absolutely dependent even for maintaining a minimum standard of living, be reduced to the agrarian misery which we are professing to alleviate?

This could only happen in an atmosphere where the truth has been suppressed.

Nowhere is the effective suppression of the true facts by American authorities more glaringly obvious than in the continued suppression of the report on German industry prepared by the Collison Commission last summer, at the specific request of the President. This report, along with the Wolfe report and the Humphrey report, also prepared at the request of the President, are still top secrets denied to the American people. They are just as secret, Mr. President, as were some of the agreements I called for a year ago, some of them only in the possession of the President of the United States and of the Department of State, agreements which even the Foreign Relations Committee of this body had not seen up to that time and have not yet seen.

Yet the Collison report clearly proved that if we continue our senseless policy of destruction of German industry, it will take 180,000 man-years to dismantle and reassemble those plants, all at an incalculable cost to the American taxpayers.

Mr. President, there is an even more obvious reason for the President's omission of the German problem from his inaugural address, namely—the President knows only too well that his program for strengthening freedom throughout the world can only be accomplished by the restoration of national and international law among the peoples concerned. He and no one else in the world can do it without the restoration of national and international law among the peoples concerned.

Important as the solution of the economic problems of the world is, it is of secondary importance to the moral and spiritual struggle which we must win. Nowhere is this so important as in the case of the German-speaking peoples. If we are not able to convince them that our American form of government and way of life provide safeguards of human dignity, human decency and human freedom—security for individuals under a system of law that guarantees his rights, not only the war and the peace but the whole cause of human freedom will be lost to communism, in Europe, as well as in Asia.

Mr. President, how are we succeeding in this struggle? Even Mr. Justice Jackson himself, who helped to formulate the procedures under which the War Crimes Trials are being conducted, insists that the most important function of these trials is to show the German people what happened under the savage repudiation of all human values under their own totalitarian regime, and the vast difference between that system of law and our own magnificent system of legal justice.

Are we succeeding in this objective? The record of what has transpired is becoming more contradictory, and more disgraceful to America day by day. The steady deterioration of our attempts to administer American concepts of justice, and to restore a legal basis upon which human dignity and the security of personal rights may be restored in Germany, becomes more of a mockery of our own traditional principles of jurisprudence with every day that passes.

Mr. President, slowly but surely the whole question of what constitutes the legal basis upon which we are carrying out our conqueror's role in Germany becomes more of a frightening enigma. I ask my colleagues on the Senate floor if there is a single one of them who knows just what basis our continuing actions in Germany have in constitutional or international law? I ask them further just what people are going to do if they awaken some day to discover that instead of Administering our interests and American principles of justice in the occupied countries, we have been playing the role of a hate-happy hangman in violation of the plain mandates of the Constitution, in prostitution of our own standards of justice, in violation of the Hague Convention of 1908, which guaranteed the inviolability of personal rights and property, and in violation of the Geneva Convention's safeguards of the rights and interests of prisoners of war.

Mr. President, these questions are all now pointing up the larger question of just what constitutes the legal foundation upon which we are carrying out our international programs.

Does any Senator know? Does any member of the Committee on Foreign Relations know?

When we look into this matter, we find that the war crimes trials themselves were set up under the authority of the London four-power agreement of August 8, 1945, which set up the Nuremberg trial procedures.

Since then we have been parties to 10 additional trials, which were based on the authority of the Allied Control Council law of December 20, 1945. This Control Council Law No. 10 thus is also derived from the authority of the four-power agreement.

Yet all these procedures have been based on the executive order which authorized Justice Jackson to represent the American people at the Four-Power Conference.

The basis of this Executive order is found in the secret conference which produced the Moscow Declaration in 1943.

These facts become all-important because of the fact that our own Supreme Court has now become divided against itself on the question of similar procedures which have been followed by this Government in the Far East.

On December 16, the International Tribunal which has tried the Japanese war crimes cases was attacked before the Supreme Court by Mr. Walter Logan, of New York, as an illegal creation of this Government. This body was described as a rare creation of the executive branch of our Government and the military authority thereunder, and it was contended that this action was carried out without a treaty, which must be approved by Congress.

This international tribunal was set up by order of General MacArthur, on February 15, 1946, under the authority of the Potsdam Declaration and the Moscow Conference of Foreign Ministers, to which I previously referred.

The confusion which surrounds these issues is best revealed by the tie vote of the Supreme Court on the question of whether it even had the power to hear Mr. Logan's petition. I want every Senator to realize this; and I hope that some Senator on the other side of the aisle will answer it if he can.

Mr. Justice Jackson broke the tie which brought the case before the Court because he admitted that for us to let the convictions of the Japanese stand by a tie vote, while it would embarrass the United States to review the matter, "would leave a stain on our record in the oriental mind forever."

Mr. Justice Frankfurter further revealed the confusion which continues to mount when he admitted that under our present international agreements:

> Something may be illegal and still be international, and so be something over which this court has no jurisdiction.

The ominous prospects for the future, which are being strengthened by every day we let this whole matter go unchecked, are revealed in the Government brief which was prepared on this case, which warns that—

> Once it is suggested that American courts may review the judgments of an international court, or pass upon the actions of an international authority's agents, most unhappy consequences can be anticipated in the development of international affairs.

That is the very best that the lawyers for our Government could do in that case.

Mr. President, in spite of the gathering evidence to prove the questionable and dangerous legal basis upon which we are conducting our international relations—evidence which continues to mount—we now find that the President, instead of taking constructive action to review this extremely important matter, has now asked the Senate to get in even deeper by ratifying the Inter-American Charter which was signed by our American representatives at the Bogota Conference last year.

Yet the ranking member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], has himself become aroused over the legal implications of our international policies.

I want every member on the opposite side of the aisle to reflect upon this. The Senator from Georgia has attacked this Inter-American Charter as "fantastic and ridiculous" and charges that it would violate United States principles of State and municipal rights in the fields of education, labor, and racial matters.

I am delighted to note that the Senator from Georgia is present. I commend him for the fine, honest statement which he made in connection with this agreement of a year ago.

He has declared that he was astonished by the scope of the details of this Charter, which amounted almost "to the detailed regulations of a local police force."

Mr. President, I raise this whole question as to the legal basis for our present international policies at this time because it has become perfectly apparent that if Congress does not now assume full responsibility for investigating this over-all problem, we may find some day that we have acted too late to stop the destruction of our American concepts, principles, and safeguards of justice.

Mr. President, I intend, also at a later date, to go into this whole subject exhaustively. Yet, as proof of the possibility that such prospects lie in store for us, I want again to refer to specific charges that have been made against the administration of justice by the military courts conducted by American authorities in Germany. I wish to call attention to developments that have transpired since I submitted on the Senate floor, last Thursday, January 27, Senate Resolution 39, which calls for an investigation of these charges.

These charges were made by Col. Willis N. Everett, a distinguished American lawyer who had served as defense counsel for the 74 Germans accused in the famous Malmedy case. These charges stated that American investigators at the United States court in Dachau, Germany, used brutal, vicious, Nazi methods to obtain confessions from men who are being hanged by American prison authorities.

In response to these charges, Secretary Royall last spring appointed Justice Gordon Simpson, of the Texas Supreme Court, and Judge Edward Van Roden to investigate these trials. The report of the investigators is contained in a recent article written by Judge Van Roden, appearing in the February issue of The Progressive, which I now ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN ATROCITIES IN GERMANY

(By Judge Edward L. Van Roden)

(Edward L. Van Roden, a Pennsylvania judge, served in World Wars I and II, in the latter as Chief of the Military Justice Division for the European Theater where he saw service in Normandy, Belgium, the Rhineland, the Battle of the Bulge, and in the Ardennes. In 1946 he was reassigned to active duty and served on several important court martial trials in Germany. In 1948 Secretary of the Army Royall appointed him to an extraordinary commission charged with investigating the Dachau war crimes program.)

I

American investigators at the United States Court in Dachau, Germany, used the following methods to obtain confessions:

Beatings and brutal kickings.
Knocking out teeth and breaking jaws.
Mock trials.
Solitary confinement.
Posturing as priests.
Very limited rations.
Spiritual deprivation.
Promises of acquittal.

Complaints concerning these third-degree methods were received by Secretary of the Army Kenneth Royall last spring. Royall appointed Justice Gordon Simpson, of the Texas Supreme Court, and me to go to Germany and check up on the reports. Accompanied by Lt. Col. Charles Lawrence, Jr., we went to Munich, Germany, set up offices there, and heard a stream of testimony about the way in which American atrocities were committed.

But first, a bit of the background:

Last spring the Supreme Court refused the habeas corpus petition of Col. Willis N. Everett, Jr., an American lawyer, who had served as defense counsel for the 74 Germans accused in the famous Malmedy case. Everett is a very able lawyer, a conscientious and sincere gentleman. He is not a fanatic.

In his petition, Everett charged that the Germans had not received a fair trial. Everett did not claim that all the German defendants were innocent, but since they did not have a fair trial, there was no way of telling the innocent from the guilty.

The tragedy is that so many of us Americans, having fought and won the war with so much sweat and blood, now say, "All Germans should be punished." We won the war, but some of us want to go on killing. That seems to me wicked.

If Everett's shocking charges were true, they would be a blot on the American conscience for eternity. The fact that there were atrocities by the Germans during the war against Americans, or by Americans against Germans, would not in the least lessen our disgrace if such peacetime atrocities were to go unchallenged.

Our specific assignment was not only to examine Colonel Everett's charges, but also to examine the cases of the 139 death sentences, which at that time remained unexecuted; 152 Germans had already been executed.

The 139 doomed men who were still alive fell into three groups. They were accused of involvement in the Dachau concentration camp crimes, in the killing of American fliers, or in the Malmedy massacres. Let me say that I believe the crimes for which these Germans were tried actually took place, and that some Germans were guilty of them.

But we should not let the indiscriminate hate of all Germans that was generated during and after the war blind us to the necessity of punishing the guilty ones only.

After this investigation, and after talking to all sides, I do not believe that the German people knew what the German Government was doing. I am convinced the German populace had no idea what diabolical crimes that archfiend, Himmler, was committing in the concentration camps. From the atrocities we learned about, he must have been the very prince of devils.

But as for the Germans at large, they fought the war as loyal citizens with a fatherland to support, and a fatherland to defend.

Some American fliers, shot down on bombing raids over Germany, were killed by German civilians. These Germans felt that the American fliers were the murderers of their defenseless wives, mothers, and children who were in the bombed cities—just as the English felt that German fliers were their murderers. That's war.

I felt deeply about these fliers. I had two sons in the Air Force. Jimmy made 35 missions over Germany and returned safe, thank God! Dick made 32 missions and was finally shot down over Italy. He spent 12 months in a German prisoner-of-war camp and was fairly well treated. He is now in a sanitarium in Arizona recovering from TB he contracted in the camp.

II

The Malmedy massacres, in which a group of American prisoners of war were mown down after being captured during the Battle of the Bulge, actually happened. But can't we distinguish between the assertion that these atrocities did happen, and the assertion that they were committed by these 74 Germans who had been in or near Malmedy at that time?

Because some wicked, sadistic German individuals did it, are we doing the right thing by saying any and all Germans we lay our hands on are guilty and should be destroyed? I personally don't believe that. That's not the way of thinking I learned in my church, or you learned in your church.

On Russian insistence, the Americans couldn't retry these men. The Russian philosophy in these matters is that the investigators determine the guilt or innocence of the accused, and the judge merely sets the sentence. We accepted the Russian formula of no retrial, but we won out on the presumption of innocence before trial.

The American prohibition of hearsay evidence had been suspended. Second- and third-hand testimony was admitted, although the Judge Advocate General warned against the value of hearsay evidence, especially when it was obtained, as this was, two or three years after the act.

Lieutenant Colonel Ellis and Lieutenant Perl of the prosecution pleaded that it was difficult to obtain competent evidence. Perl told the court, "We had a tough case to crack and we had to use persuasive methods." He admitted to the court that the persuasive methods included various "expedients, including some violence and mock trials." He further told the court that the cases rested on statements obtained by such methods.

The statements which were admitted as evidence were obtained from men who had first been kept in solitary confinement for 3, 4, and 5 months. They were confined between four walls, with no windows, and no opportunity of exercise. Two meals a day were shoved in to them through a slot in the door. They were not allowed to talk to anyone. They had no communication with their families or any minister or priest during that time.

This solitary confinement proved sufficient in itself in some cases to persuade the Germans to sign prepared statements. These statements not only involved the signer, but often would involve other defendants.

III

Our investigators would put a black hood over the accused's head and then punch him in the face with brass knuckles, kick him, and beat him with rubber hose. Many of the German defendants had teeth knocked out. Some had their jaws broken.

All but two of the Germans, in the 1939 cases we investigated, had been kicked in the testicles beyond repair. This was standard operating procedure with American investigators.

Perl admitted use of mock trials and persuasive methods including violence and said the court was free to decide the weight to be attached to evidence thus received. But it all went in.

One 18-year-old defendant, after a series of beatings, was writing a statement being dictated to him. When they reached the sixteenth page the boy was locked up for the night. In the early morning Germans in nearby cells heard him muttering, "I will not utter another lie." When the jailer came in later to get him to finish his false statement he found the German hanging from a cell bar, dead. However, the statement that the German lad hanged himself to escape signing was offered and received in evidence in the trial of the others.

Sometimes a prisoner who refused to sign was led into a dimly lit room, where a group of civilian investigators, wearing United States Army uniforms, were seated around a black table with a crucifix in the center and two candles burning, one on each side. "You will now have your American trial," the defendant was told.

The sham court passed a sham sentence of death. Then the accused was told, "You will hang in a few days, as soon as the general approves this sentence; but in the meantime sign this confession and we can get you acquitted." Some still wouldn't sign.

We were shocked by the crucifix being used so mockingly.

In another case, a bogus Catholic priest (actually an investigator) entered the cell of one of the defendants, heard his confession, gave him absolution, and then gave him a little friendly tip: "Sign whatever the investigators ask you to sign. It will get you your freedom. Even though it's false, I can give you absolution now in advance for the lie you'd tell."

Our final report on these trials has been turned over to Secretary of the Army Royall. In spite of the many instances like those I have described, we found no general conspiracy to obtain evidence improperly. With the exception of 29 cases, we saw no reason why the executions should not be carried out. For the 110 others, there was sufficient competent evidence obtained from other sources to warrant the death penalty, exclusive of the evidence obtained by the third degree.

The 29 men whose sentences we recommended for commutation certainly did not have a fair trial by American standards. Twenty-seven of them were to have their terms reduced to life, one of them was to get 10 years, and one would get two and one-half years, according to our recommendations. We also recommended a permanent program of clemency for reconsideration of the sentences of other prisoners convicted in war crimes cases.

Secretary Royall has saved our national conscience. Could we as Americans ever have held our heads up, if he hadn't looked into it? He has saved our national prestige and our international reputation.

However, in spite of Secretary Royall's action in this matter, there is little real room for complacency on the part of Americans. Rather our report reveals, by implication, that we still have a serious situation in Germany to clear up. Moreover, five of the men for whom we recommended commutations have been hanged since we turned in our report. In all, 100 of the 139 we set out to investigate are now dead.

IV

The American investigators who committed the atrocities in the name of American justice and under the American flag are going scot free.

At this point there are two objectives which should be aimed for:

1. Those 39 prisoners whose death sentences have not been commuted and who have not yet been hanged should be saved, pending full judicial review.

2. American investigators who abused the powers of victory and prostituted justice to vengeance, should be exposed in a public process, preferably in the United States, and prosecuted.

Unless these crimes committed by Americans are exposed by us at home, the prestige of America and American justice will suffer permanent and irreparable damage. We can partially atone for our own misconduct if we first search it out and publicly condemn and disavow it. If we wait for our enemies to blazon our guilt abroad, we can only bow our heads in shamed admission.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, suffice it to say, these findings were accompanied by recommendations for clemency and judicial review of 29 cases because of the third-degree methods used by the American prosecutors, a fact which has been admitted by a certain Lieutenant Perl, one of the prosecutors, as the article states.

In all fairness, let us also admit that certain Americans connected with the trials have protested that these charges are not true and are demanding the right to answer them, as the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BALDWIN] pointed out on the Senate floor on January 27.

In other words, Mr. President, this is a general statement of developments in this particular matter up to last Thursday. In spite of the gravity of these charges, neither the accusers nor the accused nor the victims have been able to have a chance to present the facts or to justify their own actions before an impartial court of review.

Yet since then events have transpired which make action by this body all the more imperative if we are to see that American concepts of justice are not to become an international disgrace.

It now develops that the Protestant churches of this country have become so aroused that, on January 19, Dr. Franklin C. Frye, president of the United Lutheran Church, and Dr. Samuel Cavert, of the Federal Council of Churches, visited the Attorney General, seeking to expedite a review of these charges. They were informed, however, that while the Department of Justice admitted responsibility for the general procedures under which these trials are being conducted, it would not accept any responsibility for specific procedures subsequently conducted, and that complete jurisdiction lay in the hands of the military.

Then, Mr. President, on January 29, 2 days after I submitted my resolution, a Democratic Senator and two Members of the House of Representatives visited Secretary Royall and obtained a 60-day reprieve for 12 of the German soldiers condemned to death in these trials. According to the Detroit Times, these legislators "protested bitterly that the executions would be a blot on American justice before the entire world and might vitally affect international relations with European countries."

Yet, Mr. President, it further develops that General Clay has also acted, granting Colonel Everett 30 days more in which to bring his petition for review before the International Court at the Hague. Such action is a direct and deliberate evasion of the recommendations of the investigating committee appointed by Secretary Royall that the whole procedure be reviewed by American courts.

Now, Mr. President, in spite of all the promises and recommendations of the authorities, we learn that last Wednesday six more Germans were hung at Landsburg prison.

Mr. President, a man who is determined to see justice done, and who is determined above all else to preserve the integrity and the principles upon which our whole American system of jurisprudence depends, cannot let this continuing outrage go unchallenged. Where there is so much smoke, there must be a fire raging. If these fires are destroying innocent victims, it is an international crime. If these fires are destroying the reputation and injuring the character of American personnel, who have been entrusted with carrying out these orders, it is a national disgrace. If the military authorities continue to insist on ignoring their promises, or evading the full responsibility for what has happened by diverting review of this matter to an international court, they insult our whole American judicial system and flaunt their power in the face of Congress itself.

Mr. President, I am pleading now for an American investigation of this whole tragic affair, because as matters have developed, it becomes more and more apparent that unless Congress now steps into the picture and puts its full power into a determined effort to clear up not only this affair but the whole question of the legal basis upon which we continue to administer occupied countries, we may be found guilty, in the course of the passing years, of having permitted, by our silent acquiescence, the destruction of constitutional and international law, upon which our future as a free people is absolutely dependent.

In closing, Mr. President, I feel it my duty to call the attention of the members of the Senate and the attention of the American people to additional evidence of the vengeful spirit which only hate-happy hangmen would exhibit as representatives of the American people in the administration of justice.

I offer this information because I believe it reveals the extent to which hate has gripped many of those who are carrying on American interests, a hatred which breeds only hatred, which prolongs and intensifies mutual jealousies, bitterness, and a burning desire for revenge—hatred which goes even so far as to despoil the graves of victims of its own perverted delight. In saying this, Mr. President, no one is more determined than I to see stern justice meted out to those who have been guilty of indescribable crimes against humanity. But I cannot forget the greatest heights that have ever been reached by an American statesman, when Abraham Lincoln pleaded in his Second Inaugural Address for justice administered "with malice toward none, with charity for all."

Mr. President, I am about to read from a letter written to General Clay on December 6, 1948, by Johann Neuhausler, Catholic auxiliary bishop of Munich. Mr. President, if the other Members of the Senate read nothing else of what I have to say at this time except this letter, I shall be satisfied. The letter reads as follows:

DEAR GENERAL: I would like to call to your attention two deplorable incidents which have happened at Landsberg.

On December 2, the guards tore down the Christmas wreaths, which the prisoners had put up in their cells, and kicked them to bits.

I was astonished to hear this because I never experienced anything like it or so shocking during the 4 years, and Christmas I spent as prisoner at the concentration camp at Dachau. There the Christmas wreath was never taken from us.

The second matter is much more important. In recent weeks in the Spoettinger graveyard, near Landsberg, the crosses and tablets with the names of those buried there were taken away. The graves of those are the graves of men executed at Landsberg. In the place of the crosses little tablets with the numbers of the prisoners were put up.

Even if one actually believes that after death, even the names of the condemned men must be wiped out, it is still incredible, from the Christian standpoint, to take away from them the cross that priestly hands have put over them with the words: "May the Cross of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, who has redeemed you in this sign, be shown above you. Peace be with you."

When the church speaks over such graves these words of grace for law-breakers, it only follows the example of its founder who promised paradise to a sinner on the cross. And on His grace we are all dependent.

Formerly, when the Nazis tore down the crosses in graveyards, as at Munich, Catholic men and women rose up and put the crosses back in spite of all danger. Priests were sent to concentration camps for many years for doing this, for instance, Father Martin Rohrmeier of Affertig.

Christians of many professions see also in the removal of the crosses from the graves, a contempt of the cross itself and a violation of the dead. These Christians will not and cannot be silenced, so deeply do they resent and condemn what was begun by the Nazis.

I am sure that the general will condemn this behaviour of the prison authorities at Landsburg and will order restoration of the crosses at once.

(Signed) JOHANN NEUHAUSLER,
Auxiliary Bishop of the Catholic Diocese of Munich.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I say when administrators of American justice have to stoop to these levels to wreak their hate and vengence even on the dead, it is time the American people demanded to know if this is what American justice has come to be, so grand a name for so mean a thing.

So I say once more, Mr. President, the resolution offered last Thursday by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut and the resolution I offered on the same day deserve favorable consideration by the Senate, so that the American people may know once and for all whether the charges made by Lutheran and Catholic, the charges made by Judge Simpson and Judge Van Roden, two men appointed by the President, are true or whether they are false.

REGULATION OF EXPORTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 548) to provide for continuation of authority for the regulation of exports, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendments will be stated.

The first committee amendment was, in section 2, on page 2, in line 9, after the word "and", to strike out "fulfill" and insert "to aid in fulfilling," so as to make the section read:

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. The Congress hereby declares that it is the policy of the United States to use export controls to the extent necessary (a) to protect the domestic economy from the excessive drain of scarce materials and to reduce the inflationary impact of abnormal foreign demand; (b) to further the foreign policy of the United States and to aid in fulfilling its international responsibilities; and (c) to exercise the necessary vigilance over exports from the standpoint of their significance to the national security.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next committee amendment was, in section 3, subsection (a), on page 2, in line 21, after the word "financing", to strike out "carriage" and insert "transporting"; and on page 3, after line 2, to insert the following:

(c) The authority conferred by this section shall not be exercised with respect to any agricultural commodity, including fats and oils, during any period for which the supply of such commodity is determined by the Secretary of Agriculture to be in excess of the requirements of the domestic economy, except to the extent required to effectuate the policies set forth in clause (b) or clause (c) of section 2 hereof.

So as to make the section read:

AUTHORITY

SEC. 3. (a) To effectuate the policies set forth in section 2 hereof, the President may prohibit or curtail the exportation from the United States, its Territories, and possessions, of any articles, materials, or supplies, including technical data, except under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe. To the extent necessary to achieve effective enforcement of this act, such rules and regulations may apply to the financing, transporting, and other servicing of exports and the participation therein by any person.

(b) The President may delegate the power, authority, and discretion conferred upon him by this act to such departments, agencies, or officials of the Government as he may deem appropriate.

(c) The authority conferred by this section shall not be exercised with respect to any agricultural commodity, including fats and oils, during any period for which the supply of such commodity is determined by the Secretary of Agriculture to be in excess of the requirements of the domestic economy, except to the extent required to effectuate the policies set forth in clause (b) or clause (c) of section 2 hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next committee amendment was, in section 4, subsection (a), on page 3, in line 15, after the word "department" to insert a comma, and after the word "agency" to insert a comma and "or official"; and in subsection (b), on page 4, in line 5, after the word "agency", to insert a comma and "or official", so as to make the section read:

CONSULTATION AND STANDARDS

SEC. 4. (a) In determining which articles, materials, or supplies shall be controlled hereunder, and in determining the extent to which exports thereof shall be limited, any department, agency, or official making these determinations shall seek information and advice from the several executive departments and independent agencies concerned with aspects of our domestic and foreign policies and operations having an important bearing on exports.

(b) In authorizing exports, full utilization of private competitive trade channels shall be encouraged insofar as practicable, giving consideration to the interests of small business, merchant exporters as well as producers, and established and new exporters, and provisions shall be made for representative trade consultation to that end. In addition, there may be applied such other standards or criteria as may be deemed necessary by the head of such department or agency, or official to carry out the policies of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next committee amendment was, in section 6, subsection (a), on page 5, in line 4, after the word "court", to insert "of the United States"; and in subsection (c), in line 17, after the word "department", to insert a comma and "or official", so as to make the section read:

ENFORCEMENT

SEC. 6. (a) To the extent necessary or appropriate to the enforcement of this act, the head of any department or agency exercising any functions hereunder (and officers or employees of such department or agency specifically designated by the head thereof) may make such investigations and obtain such information from, require such reports or the keeping of such records by, make such inspection of the books, records, and other writings, premises, or property of, and take the sworn testimony of, any person. In addition, such officers or employees may administer oaths or affirmations, and may by subpena require any person to appear and testify or to appear and produce books, records, and other writings, or both, and in case of contumacy by, or refusal to obey a subpena issued to, any such person, the district court of the United States for any district in which such person is found or resides or transacts business, upon application shall have jurisdiction to issue an order requiring such person to appear and give testimony or to appear and produce books, records, and other writings, or both, and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

(b) No person shall be excused from complying with any requirements under this section because of his privilege against self-incrimination, but the immunity provisions of the Compulsory Testimony Act of February 11, 1893 (27 Stat. 443), shall apply with respect to any individual who specifically claims such privilege.

(c) No department, agency, or official exercising any functions under this act shall publish or disclose information obtained hereunder which is deemed confidential or with reference to which a request for confidential treatment is made by the person furnishing such information unless the head of such department or agency determines that the withholding thereof is contrary to the national interest.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next committee amendment was, in section 8, on page 6, in line 7, after the word "agency", to insert a comma and "or official", so as to make the section read:

QUARTERLY REPORT

SEC. 8. The head of any department or agency, or official exercising any functions under this act shall make a quarterly report, within 45 days after each quarter, to the President and to the Congress of his operations hereunder.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next committee amendment was, in section 11, on page 7, in line 5, before the word "regulations", to insert "rules", so as to make the section read:

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 11. This act shall take effect February 28, 1949, upon the expiration of section 6 of the act of July 2, 1940 (54 Stat. 714), as amended. All outstanding delegations, rules, regulations, orders, licenses, or other forms of administrative action under said section 6 of the act of July 2, 1940, shall, until amended or revoked, remain in full force and effect, the same as if promulgated under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, in my judgment, the time has come to take off all limitations and restrictions on exports of agricultural products, except those necessary from the point of view of our national security and our diplomatic position.

On the basis of our experience during the last few months with the administration of these controls on exports, they have been used to a large extent to beat down the prices of many of our principal agricultural products. During the last few days in particular, the cattle market has been in a tailspin. All the grain markets generally have been falling further, and the fats and oils have suffered worst of all. The price of lard has actually fallen to a point lower than at any time since 1942. In the face of these facts, the administration is still holding down sale of our surpluses to foreign markets of most of these products.

In section 2 of this bill, the declaration of policy under (a), it is stated that the purpose of the bill is "to reduce the inflationary impact of abnormal foreign demand." Translated into plain language, I presume that means that it is the purpose to push down the prices of the controlled commodities. Certainly that is what has been done, very effectively. A manipulation of these controls has pushed the price of lard down almost to prewar prices. Apparently some administration officials feel that the cure for inflation is to push farm prices down to prewar levels. That policy simply will not work today. It is out of the question for the farmer to operate on the basis of prewar prices for the products he produces when his living costs, his costs of operation, his hired man, and everything else he must pay have gone up about double and have stabilized at a new high level.

On the side of agricultural prices there is no longer a problem of inflation. The real problem is deflation. That has been true for some months, and it is more true than ever today. Apparently many officials of this administration do not realize that fact.

The distinguished chairman of the committee, the Senator from South Carolina, has said frankly that in his judgment the controls on fats and oils have been miserably handled. Certainly that is the case. Although controls have been taken off the inedible fats and oils, our exports of edible fats, such as lard, are still under control in spite of the extreme slump in the markets. Under these circumstances, I cannot see why our Government should continue to restrict our export outlets. If we do extend this authority, we can only expect that the controls on lard and other agricultural products will continue to be "miserably handled," as the distinguished Senator has put it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further amendments, the question is on engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEF CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

Mr. O'CONOR. The expected has happened. True to their predetermined plan the Communist government of Hungary has imposed a sentence of life imprisonment on Josef Cardinal Mindszenty. His "crime" was that he remained true to his convictions and refused to be intimidated by oppressors who are bent upon spreading the doctrines of Soviet Russia.

The sentence is worse than death. The tortures, to which this helpless individual has been subjected, will now be continued.

Of course, the individual considerations of any one person, serious though they may be, might not be of world-wide importance. But, in this instance, the real issue is not one man. No better description of it could be given than in the words of the reverend Chaplain of the Senate, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, when he said:

> This fight is not just between Roman Catholicism and communism. It is between a godless communism and any type of Christianity worthy of the name.

We protest this outrageous treatment of an outstanding religious leader. If allowed to remain unchanged, it offers proof that conditions behind the iron curtain are abhorrent to American concepts. Because it is the climax of continued and uninterrupted persecution and oppression of free institutions, it stamps Communist leaders everywhere, taking orders from Moscow, as determined to uproot the basic principles from which democracy springs.

Most significant is the statement made today by the so-called judge in imposing the sentence on Cardinal Mindszenty. This morning in citing three alleged extenuating circumstances in the case, he specified one, as follows:

> The United States through its Minister here, Selden Chapin, made him (the Cardinal) hope that the United States of America would start a war and this war would help him attain his aims.

That is an excellent sample of the integrity, the truth, and the justice of this disgraceful court. The news dispatches declare that the presiding judge severely criticized the United States for meddling in Hungarian affairs. Such criticism is praise, indeed. America will continue to cry out in protest against godless men who are engaged in a vain effort to abolish religion from the hearts of men.

I respectfully urge that the State Department, voicing the feelings of the American people as revealed so definitely these past few days, convey to the Hungarian Government the sense of outrage and shock which has been the reaction of the American people to the arrest and trial of Cardinal Mindszenty.

I urge that the State Department present as vigorously as possible to the representative of the Hungarian Government the conviction that immense good could be accomplished toward the improvement of relations between Hungary and the United States if this sentence of life imprisonment could be suspended.

TWO-YEAR CRUSADE—BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, one of America's great agencies, the Boy Scouts of America, which operates under a Federal charter granted by Congress, is this week observing its thirty-ninth anniversary. Since it was founded, in 1910, over 15,500,000 Americans have been members, a segment of our population large enough to exert a real impact on our national life. The Boy Scouts of America are inaugurating what they term a 2-year crusade, under the slogan Strengthen the Army of Liberty.

The purpose of this campaign is to stimulate a better understanding of the principles of liberty and democracy, symbolized by the great Statue of Liberty in New York Harbor, and specifically to give training to boys in citizenship and those vigorous qualities of character which we like to believe are typically American.

The Boy Scouts of America have announced that as an appropriate celebration of their fortieth anniversary next year they propose to present to America by the end of 1950 a Scout movement surpassing in its outreach and program anything that has been previously achieved.

I am sure that all American citizens will wish the Scouts well in this ambitious undertaking. I hope that Members of the Senate will go further, and lend our support and leadership to them, both in our home communities and on a national basis.

SPECIAL SMALL BUSINESS COMMITTEE

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, yesterday the distinguished minority leader submitted a resolution which he requested be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration. The resolution dealt with small business. The Chair held that the resolution should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, from which ruling the able Senator from Nebraska took an appeal. At the close of the morning hour we were still debating that appeal. It is now on the table, as I understand the parliamentary situation, and I should like to move that the Senate proceed further to consider the matter.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, it is unnecessary for the majority leader to move to bring up the resolution. If he wants to consider it at this time, I should be glad to grant consent. I have already stated to the majority leader that I wanted to work with his program, as I understood it. As I understand the situation, a vote was not taken and the resolution is now at the desk or on the table, and has the same status as would a bill. It can be raised by unanimous consent or by a motion. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is on the calendar. It may be taken up either by motion or by unanimous consent.

Mr. WHERRY. Yesterday we considered the resolution offered by the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] and this subject was the unfinished business. I do not wish to delay the proceedings. I should be glad to grant unanimous consent to proceed to debate and a vote on the appeal.

Mr. LUCAS. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Nebraska, and I ask unanimous consent for the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the appeal from the ruling of the Chair taken by the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senator from Illinois made a motion that the appeal be laid on the table. That went over with the resolution.

Mr. LUCAS. I will withdraw that.

Mr. WHERRY. Does it require unanimous consent to withdraw a motion to lay on the table?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No, it does not, no action having been taken.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Aiken | Hoey | Murray |
| Anderson | Holland | Myers |

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on the appeal of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] from the ruling of the Chair referring his resolution, Senate Resolution 55, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, before the vote on the question now pending, I desire to address the Senate briefly in reply to the argument that was made by the distinguished minority leader [Mr. WHERRY] yesterday.

I think it goes without saying that the distinguished Vice President, in his answer to the able Senator from Nebraska, said all that could be said with respect to the merits of the controversy pending before the Senate at this time. The sole question is whether or not the Senate will approve the position taken by the Chair in referring Senate Resolution 55 to the Committee on Banking and Currency, or will sustain the appeal from the decision of the Chair, which would mean that Resolution 55 would be sent to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Any Senator who has carefully examined the Reorganization Act, and studied the jurisdiction of the various committees which are created by the Reorganization Act, must reach the conclusion that the Committee on Rules and Administration has no jurisdiction whatsoever of the subject matter of Senate Resolution 55. In my judgment the Committee on Rules and Administration is the last committee of the Senate which has any jurisdiction over the subject matter contained in the resolution. I agree with the able Senator, and agree with the position taken by the distinguished Vice President, that many committees do have jurisdiction over some of the questions which are involved in the problems of small business, but by and large, when consideration is given to all the bills which have been referred to the Banking and Currency Committee with respect to finance, the allocation of materials, controls, and all other similar questions, obviously this resolution must go to the Committee on Banking and Currency if it is to be decided strictly upon a legal basis.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. I have been following the distinguished Senator's argument for the past 2 or 3 minutes, and I ask him if the issue is not whether the problem of small business is of such consequence and importance in our country today, by reason of a number of different factors, that it warrants the creation of a special, separate committee. That being the case, it seems to me it is not a question of whether the particular subject to be dealt with by the committee falls under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency, but rather, it is an administrative question. That is, in the organization of the Senate, in order for the Senate to carry on its business, is not the problem of the small-business man so important that it warrants being dealt with through the services of a special committee? Is not that really the issue?

Mr. LUCAS. I would not agree with the Senator from Connecticut that that is the issue so far as the pending question is concerned.

I do not want to be misunderstood, Mr. President, with respect to my interest in small business. Members of the Senate will recall that the Senator from Illinois, before the Reorganization Act came into being, was chairman of the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate of the United States. As chairman of the Senate Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate from 1941 through 1946 it became my duty to pass upon the amount of funds to be allotted to carry on the activities of the Small Business Committee during that year.

Mr. BALDWIN. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. LUCAS. Let me finish, please. From 1941 to 1946, as chairman of the Committee To Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I saw to it that $380,000 was appropriated by the United States Senate to carry on the activities and the functions of the Small Business Committee. The distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] at that time was a minority member of that committee, and we worked together with respect to the amount of funds that we believed to be necessary in order for the Small Business Committee to carry on in an efficient manner.

Mr. President, I relate the early history of the Small Business Committee created in the United States Senate so that the Senate and the country may know that the Senator from Illinois is just as interested in finding a way here in the Senate to help small business, as is any other Senator. But what I am arguing today is not that question at all. I am merely presenting the argument before the Senate with respect to the wording of the resolution which is before us; and the merits or the demerits of the Small Business Committee have nothing to do with the parliamentary situation with which the Senate is now confronted.

Let me say a word, Mr. President, with respect to parliamentary law and procedure. I undertake to say that the Senate of the United States must adhere rigidly and strictly to parliamentary procedure if we are to handle the business of the Senate in an orderly way.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. LUCAS. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BALDWIN. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question. Does he believe—and I base the question upon his representation, which I know to be sincere, of his wide interest in small business—does the Senator believe that the problem of the small-business man is so important and so peculiar that it warrants the creation of a separate committee to deal with it?

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator mean a separate standing committee?

Mr. BALDWIN. A separate committee, standing or otherwise.

Mr. LUCAS. I will say to my friend that this question is not before the Senate at this time. The question is not germane to the issue here at all. And while I know the rule of germaneness does not apply, and that a Senator can ask another Senator almost any question he desires, the only reply I am going to make to my able friend is that small business will not suffer one iota under the Democratic administration here in the United States Senate, whether it functions through a special committee, whether it functions through a standing committee, or whether it functions through a subcommittee of a standing committee.

Mr. BALDWIN. I submit, Mr. President, that my good friend is trying to carry water on both shoulders on this matter.

Mr. LUCAS. Oh, no.

Mr. BALDWIN. I did not ask the Senator whether the small-business man is going to suffer under the Democratic administration. I asked the simple question whether my distinguished friend from Illinois thinks that the importance and the complications of the problems of small business warrant a separate committee. That, it seems to me, Mr. President, is what we are dealing with here. It is an administrative question. In carrying on the business of the Senate is this problem so important and so complicated that it requires a special committee? That is really the point. I know that my distinguished friend has obligations, as majority leader, but I am asking him for his own opinion as to whether he thinks that the difficulty in which the small-business man now finds himself requires separate treatment? Personally, I think it does. What does the Senator from Illinois think about it?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Connecticut has made quite a speech in my time. I do not object to that at all. I think we should get away from that as much as we possibly can, however, under the strict interpretation of the rules.

Mr. BALDWIN. All my friend has to do in order to quiet me down is to answer my question and I shall be satisfied. I shall be satisfied if he answers "Yes" or "No."

Mr. LUCAS. If the Senator from Connecticut does not quiet down I will have to ask the Vice President to invoke the rule, because I did not yield to him for a long speech. The only thing I am going to say to my good friend from Connecticut is that if I must ever carry water on both shoulders I know exactly the person to whom to go in order to give me accurate information respecting how it is done. I will always turn to my friend from Connecticut if I need information as to how that performance can be accomplished.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. I will yield in a moment. But what the Senator from Connecticut asks has nothing to do with the issue here. I am not going to answer the Senator from Connecticut on that point at all, because it is not before the Senate. I will answer that question at the proper time, and there will be no doubt as to what I stand for when that time comes, Mr. President. My vote will be recorded. I will be here on the floor of the Senate when that issue is raised, and I will debate the issue at that time with my good friend. The great trouble with my friend, the Senator from Connecticut, is that he is an expert in what he is now doing. He always wants to bring in extraneous questions. He does not want to hew to the line.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. No, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois declines to yield to anyone.

Mr. DONNELL. I did not know whether the Senator objected to a query.

Mr. LUCAS. Just one moment.

Mr. DONNELL. Certainly.

Mr. LUCAS. I have always found it to be true that when a Senator is making a point, some other Senator rises and asks, "Will the Senator yield?" because he does not want the first Senator to finish the argument he is making. That is an old trick.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a query?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the able Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator for yielding. In order that he may not feel disturbed by my request, I will say that it is not my purpose to disturb him. Indeed, I agree with him quite heartily.

I should like to ask the Senator a question. In the first place, the question now before the Senate is not on the merits of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska, is it?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. DONNELL. It is merely the appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is precisely correct.

Mr. DONNELL. Therefore the only question is a question under the rules of the Senate, as to whether the Chair has or has not complied with the rules of the Senate in determining to which committee the resolution should be referred.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Missouri has correctly stated the position of the Senator from Illinois, and he has correctly stated the question with which we are dealing. This is really a technical parliamentary argument, and nothing else.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I will not be carried away by the eloquence or any other persuasion of my friend from Connecticut upon some extraneous, irrelevant matter.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. LUCAS. I am going to address myself to the point before the court, so to speak, just as I would do in arguing a demurrer before a court in a lawsuit. I will say to my good friend from Missouri that there will be plenty of time to discuss the merits or demerits of the question as to how a small-business committee should be handled in the United States Senate when that issue is raised. But that is not the present issue; and I am not going to be taken away from the issue.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President——

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to complete my inquiry?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DONNELL. In other words, I take it that the Senator from Illinois takes the view that the merits of the pending resolution are not before the Senate at this time for consideraion. The only question is whether or not the Chair was correct in his ruling that the resolution should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency rather than the Committee on Rules and Administration. Therefore the question is solely a question to be determined under the rules of the Senate, and not on the basis of the merits of the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska. Is not that correct?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Missouri states my view exactly, and I think he is eminently correct. That is the only point before the Senate. The merits are not involved. The substance of the resolution is involved, of course——

Mr. DONNELL. Only as determinative of the committee to which reference should be made.

Mr. LUCAS. Only in making a final determination, from the subject matter contained in the resolution, as to whether it should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency or some other committee. However, the question raised by my good friend from Connecticut is another issue, to be decided on another day.

Mr. DONNELL. The Senator from Connecticut has raised a question as to the merits of the resolution, rather than the legal question before the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. TOBEY and Mr. BALDWIN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield first to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. TOBEY. I suggest to the distinguished majority leader, and to the Senator from Connecticut in response to his suggestion, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Let me put into the form of a resolution the question now before the Senate:

Whereas, a resolution was submitted in the United States Senate; and

Whereas, by decision of the Presiding Officer, such resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency because that committee traditionally has considered all matters of costs, distribution, and production, plus the La Follette Act suggestion that all matters pertaining to financial aid to industry should be referred to that committee: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That such action on the part of the Presiding Officer is fully justified.

It is beyond my understanding how anyone can attack the action of the Vice President in referring this resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency. So far as small business is concerned, let me say that there is not a member of that committee, headed by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], who would permit any letting down of the bars so far as concerns help to small business, by virtue of our handling of the subject.

Mr. BALDWIN and Mr. ROBERTSON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield first to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BALDWIN. Let me state the issue as I see it——

Mr. LUCAS. I ask the Senator not to take too long in stating the issue.

Mr. BALDWIN. The Senator says that we have before us a technical parliamentary question. The question is, Which committee is going to pass upon the question of whether or not there is to be a small-business committee? That is the issue. My point is that that issue is an administrative issue.

We have in the Senate a Committee on Rules and Administration. Therefore, that committee should pass upon that particular administrative question. It is not a question of the substance of the resolution at all. It is a question of determining in what way the Senate shall function. I submit that it is the job of the Committee on Rules and Administration to determine through what committees the Senate shall function. In determining that question, ultimately we must pass upon the question whether or not the problem of the small-business man is so important and so peculiar that it warrants a special committee. In approaching the question from that angle, we have a question of rules and administration, which I submit should properly be decided by the Committee on Rules and Administration.

That is the point I wished to make, in order to make my position clear. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. LUCAS. I congratulate the Senator for at last confining his arguments strictly to what is before the Senate. I appreciate that. The Senator has his viewpoint on the question, and I respect it, although I wholly disagree with him. I do not believe that his argument would be sustained in any fair and impartial court; and I know that the distinguished Vice President is a fair and impartial individual.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Early in the session a resolution was submitted by the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] to continue the Select Committee on Small Business. That resolution was referred—and properly referred, in my opinion—to the Committee on Banking and Currency. It is my understanding—and I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois if I am correct—that this is a similar resolution. The effort is now being made to have one resolution to continue the Small Business Committee before the Committee on Banking and Currency and another before the Committee on Rules and Administration. Is not that the issue?

Mr. LUCAS. To all intents and purposes, the resolutions are the same, in my opinion. I have examined Senate Resolution 55, submitted by the able Senator from Nebraska. It is much longer and contains more material, more substance, than the Murray resolution.

Mr. ROBERTSON. But its purpose is to establish a select committee to aid small business. Was there any objection to reference of the Murray resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency? If not, why is the issue raised now?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator will have to ask my good friends on the other side of the aisle, who are now raising the issue.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. FLANDERS. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Illinois for information. Does he remember to what committee the original resolution by which the Small Business Committee was established was referred?

Mr. LUCAS. I do not. That was before the Reorganization Act was passed. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. Is the Senator from Vermont referring to the original resolution?

Mr. FLANDERS. Yes.

Mr. MAYBANK. If my memory serves me correctly, that resolution was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor in 1940 or 1941. At that time I happened to be a member of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as was the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. FLANDERS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, there is not much more that I can add to what has already been said.

It seems to me that the United States Senate must sustain the position taken by the distinguished Vice President.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. CORDON. Will the Senator discuss his views as to the difference between a resolution for the creation of a Special Committee on Small Business, on the one hand, and a resolution for the creation of a standing committee of the same type, on the other hand, with respect to the standing committee which should consider and report such a resolution?

Mr. LUCAS. I shall not go into that question, I say to my friend the Senator from Oregon, because to my way of thinking that question is not now before the Senate. So I shall not be drawn into a discussion of it. It is an important question, I say to my friend, but I shall not be drawn into an argument on that point at this time, because if I am drawn into arguments on points which I do not consider germane to the issue before us, I shall be talking all afternoon.

The issue before us, as I see it, is based on the fact that the President of the Senate has ruled that the resolution should be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, whereas certain Senators believe it should be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration. In my study of the Reorganization Act and the precedents involved, I am certain that there cannot be any question about the correctness of the decision of the Chair in this matter.

I sincerely hope that all Democratic Members of the Senate will vote to sustain the decision of the Chair; and as a matter of good parliamentary practice and a matter of keeping straight our precedents regarding important matters of this kind, I appeal to my friends on the Republican side of the aisle also to vote to sustain the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. BALDWIN. I wish to ask my friend the Senator from Illinois this question: Is it true that already the Banking and Currency Committee has indicated by its action that it will not report this resolution to the floor of the Senate? In other words, I understand that the Banking and Currency Committee has set up a Subcommittee on Small Business. Am I correct as to that?

Mr. LUCAS. I think the Senator is correct, according to my information, but that answer may be subject to qualifications.

Mr. BALDWIN. Under those circumstances, the Banking and Currency Committee has already judged the case, for that committee has created a subcommittee to deal with this matter. I submit to my friend the Senator from Illinois and I also submit to the President of the Senate that that is perfectly within the province of the committee and is perfectly proper procedure; but under those circumstances can my friend, the Senator from Illinois, assure me if the Senate ever will have an opportunity to vote on the issue whether there should be a separate standing committee to deal with the important question of the small-business man and all his complicated problems?

I submit that if the resolution is referred to the Banking and Currency Committee, as the Chair has ruled that it should be, the Banking and Currency Committee will never report it. It is not in the nature of things that the committee should do so, for it already has taken the step of creating a special subcommittee, which, as I have previously stated, it is within the committee's province to do, and is a perfectly proper thing for it to do. But my question is, When shall we have an opportunity here in the Senate to vote on the question of whether there shall be a separate committee to deal with the small-business man's problems?

A consideration of that question will give my good friend, the Senator from Illinois, an opportunity to express his feelings, as he has previously indicated he wishes to have a chance to express them, toward the problems of small business. But I submit that, under these circumstances, the question is whether the resolution will ever be reported.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. LUCAS. I have the floor, but other Senators are still making speeches in my time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will say that every Senator has a right to protect himself against an invasion of the rules, but if Senators do not feel inclined to protect themselves in that way, the Chair will attempt to do so himself.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I dislike to attempt to apply the rule strictly as against other Senators, unless a serious question is involved. However, I should say that my good friend, the Senator from Connecticut, could have made a speech much more effectively in his own time, rather than in mine.

Mr. BALDWIN. I tried to ask a question, but perhaps it was too long.

Mr. LUCAS. The question was about as long as from here to the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. It was an argument, rather than a question.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield for a question.

Mr. ROBERTSON. What I have to say will not strictly be a question, but the Senator may be assured that it will be brief.

We discussed this matter in the Banking and Currency Committee this morning, and all of us in the committee agreed that if the resolution comes to us, it will be reported. I do not say it will be reported favorably, but it will come out of the committee.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a moment ago, when I began to answer the question of the Senator from Connecticut, he immediately proceeded to go into another question, and I never had an opportunity to tell him that I do not know, any more than he does, what the Banking and Currency Committee will do about the resolution. The Senator is a member of two committees, and if he can tell what the committees of which he is a member are going to do from day to day, he can do more than most Senators can.

Yet he wishes me, as majority leader, to advise him what members of the Banking and Currency Committee will do with the resolution. Obviously, I do not know what the committee will do. The Senator could file a motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the resolution, if he is so interested in it, and thus get it on the floor, if such a resolution were agreed to. Such an attempt on another resolution was made yesterday.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. In connection with what the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] has said, I should like to say that Senate Resolution 29, submitted by Senator MURRAY on January 15, was referred to the Banking and Currency Committee. Question regarding the resolution came up this morning at the meeting of the committee. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] was there, and also the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] and other Senators.

I then suggested that no action be taken on the resolution in the committee at this time, in view of the issue now before the Senate. Of course, I do not know what the Banking and Currency Committee will do so far as the resolution is concerned; but at any rate, at the meeting of the committee this morning we postponed taking action on the resolution, pending the determination of the issue, now before the Senate, regarding the appeal from the decision of the Chair on the reference of the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], which is similar to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] and which is pending before our committee.

Let me say to the Senator from Connecticut that in the Banking and Currency Committee there has been a Subcommittee on Small Business ever since I have been a member of the committee, and two-thirds of the legislation enacted for the benefit of small business has been handled by the Banking and Currency Committee. For instance, it has handled all the legislation regarding the meat problem and all the legislation relative to war assets, as affecting small business.

I do not know whether the committee will act favorably on the resolution; but I can state, at any rate, that it met this morning, and at that meeting I asked that action on the resolution be withheld until the issue now before the Senate is determined.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair state the pending question. The question is on the appeal from the decision of the Chair referring the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency. Therefore, when the vote is taken, the question will be, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I shall take only a minute or two of the time of the Senate.

For 4 years I have been a member of the Special Committee on Small Business. I am very anxious, as I am certain all other Senators are, to have the Senate select some sort of committee to which the small-business man may bring their problems.

We now have before us three proposals: First, that we continue the special committee; second, that a standing committee on the subject be created to handle the matters affecting small business; and, third, that a subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee handle all matters which heretofore have been handled by the special committee, with a special staff, with additional appropriations, and that the subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee take over the files and the staff of the special committee.

I do not know that I particularly care which way the matter is handled, so long as a good job is done; and I believe either the special committee, a standing committee, or a subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee can do a good job.

I presume my preference might well be for a standing committee. Of course, that is something which would take a little time to decide, and I am certain that the Senate would wish to give considerable thought to the question of the creation of an additional standing committee.

I feel confident that a subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee can and will do a good job. That is particularly true if the Committee on Rules and Administration will allocate additional funds to it.

I am inclined to agree with the majority leader that at the moment the question is not whether we should or should not have a small-business committee; but I should like to ask this question, if it is in order: Would it be possible by unanimous consent to suspend the rule, in order that this question may be decided? I understand the staff of the Small Business Committee are not at the moment able to draw any pay. The authority of the committee has expired. It is therefore unable to function. The staff members I presume are quitting, because they are not being paid. I ask, when can this matter be settled? Can we have a statement from the majority leader at this time, that either a special committee, a standing committee, or a subcommittee within the Banking and Currency Committee, with sufficient funds and with a sufficient staff, will be created to handle the small-business problem?

Mr. LUCAS. I think the question is a fair one. It is hardly germane to the discussion.

Mr. CAPEHART. I appreciate that, but I think we are entitled to know.

Mr. LUCAS. As majority leader of the Senate, I may say to my able friend from Indiana, I shall make it my business to try to take constructive action with respect to the creation of some sort of small-business committee, with all convenient speed.

Mr. CAPEHART. In other words, it is not the intention, is it, to eliminate entirely some sort of committee having to do with small business, either standing or special or a subcommittee within Banking and Currency?

Mr. LUCAS. No. I know of no Senator on this side of the aisle who favors doing without a small-business committee of some kind. It is solely a question of how such a committee should be established, and of who should be in charge of it. That is about all there is to it. We will endeavor to work it out.

Mr. CAPEHART. I feel certain the Senate should be able to handle the problem or to come to a decision with respect to it within the next week.

Mr. LUCAS. I may say to my friend, if there is one resolution on the question of small business pending before the Banking and Currency Committee, and another resolution goes to the Committee on Rules and Administration, nothing will be accomplished as a result of the exercise of divided authority upon two similar resolutions to speed up the matter in line with what the Senator from Indiana is trying to accomplish.

Mr. CAPEHART. I may say in closing, I am most anxious to see a continuation of some sort of committee which will help small business. I hope the particular question now under discussion may be resolved, and then, within the next few days, the Senate may decide exactly what it intends to do. With such a decision, I am certain, whether it be to continue the special committee or to constitute a standing committee or a subcommittee of Banking and Currency, either one of the three, a good job will be done on behalf of the small-business men of America.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I merely feel that inasmuch as a few observations have been made and questions asked, which I think have not been answered, I should like to make a very brief statement in what I hope will be the closing argument on this matter.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield for a question.

Mr. DONNELL. I merely wanted to say I should like to be heard briefly on the matter. The Senator is proceeding upon the theory that his remarks will be the concluding remarks. I should like to have the Senator understand I expect to say a few words.

Mr. WHERRY. I waited briefly. I thought everybody was through. If the Senator desires to speak, I shall be glad to yield the floor to him. On the other hand, I would just as soon go ahead and sum up my observations at this time.

Mr. DONNELL. Certainly, but I want it understood I expect to make a few remarks after the Senator has spoken.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the question has been raised as to what is involved in this debate, and the statement has been made that it is only a question of procedure, that the merits of the resolution are not involved. There is no other way I know of to get a resolution or a bill referred to another committee except to appeal from the decision of the Chair after an order of reference has been made. Merely because the President of the Senate has made his decision, even though I respect it, and although I have a deep affection for the occupant of the chair, does not preclude me from asking that the resolution be referred to another committee. It is no reflection at all upon the present occupant of the chair if I avail myself of the only procedure I know of to seek to have the resolution referred to another committee where, in my opinion, it will receive more favorable consideration than in the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The distinguished Senator from Connecticut hit the nail on the head when he said it is a matter of procedure. In the final analysis what it really is, and what the businessmen of the country know it to be, is the question of whether the Congress is going to establish a special committee or a standing committee to help solve the problems of small business. That is what is involved. So when the distinguished occupant of the chair in his wisdom—and certainly he has sound argument to support his position—assigns the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency, he does so on the ground, as stated, that the committee predominantly has jurisdiction over the subject matters involved in the resolution. I ask the majority leader, or any other lawyer in the Senate, on that basis, how in the world are we to determine the jurisdictional question unless we make a study of substantive law? That is imperative. That is why I presented in the argument yesterday nine points showing that the provisions of the resolution go completely outside the province of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. I merely wish to say as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, when the President of the Senate refers the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency, as he did the resolution offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], we shall take action. I do not know what type of action it will be, but we shall take action. I want the Senator to know that since January 1 we have been doing everything we could for the small-business men. We have already had controls removed from oils and fats.

Mr. WHERRY. That is fine.

Mr. MAYBANK. We have already studied steel.

Mr. WHERRY. That is fine.

Mr. MAYBANK. We have obtained some allotments for small producers in the steel business, and so forth. I may say to the Senator, the Eighty-first Congress is going to do a great deal more for small business than was done by the Eightieth Congress, whether the matter is considered in the Banking and Currency Committee or in the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, there has been much said here, not about the merits or demerits of the proposition, or even about procedure, but about what is to be done for the small-business man. I appreciate that. I am glad to have all those declarations. But one of the first things to be done, and it should be done now, is to give the small-business men a place to come. In the event a small-business committee is set up as a subcommittee of Banking and Currency, what would happen? In order to do that, it would be necessary to go completely beyond the jurisdiction set by the Reorganization Act. The committee does not have jurisdiction of matters pertaining to monopoly. The committee would be given authority to go into questions of interstate commerce, which again is not within its province. I could stand here and cite case after case involving problems of small business, subjects entirely beyond the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency. That is what I object to. I may say now in defense of the decision of the present occupant of the chair, when he referred the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency, he thought that committee had predominant jurisdiction; but he knows, and the majority leader knows, that if the matter is assigned to Banking and Currency, and a small-business subcommittee is set up in the Banking and Currency Committee, we shall be attempting illegally to give to a subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee matters over which that committee does not now have jurisdiction. Senators may argue from now till doomsday, but that is the fact.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WHERRY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. TOBEY. If the Senator had absolute power, to what committee would he assign the resolution?

Mr. WHERRY. I answered that question yesterday. I said that if I were the present occupant of the chair I would not know to what committee to refer the resolution, for the very reason that the resolution I introduced cuts across every committee line. I think there are predominantly more subjects involved in it that are judicial in character than subjects which would be under the jurisdiction of the Banking and Currency Committee, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any of the other committees, because, in my humble opinion, if I may say so to the Senator from New Hampshire, the most vital problems involving small business today hinge around the Judiciary Committee, such as the question whether we will eliminate vertical competition which is centralizing industry in the hands of the few, whether we will provide protection for the rights which are being encroached upon in the small-business field, and whether we will permit small-business men to procure materials necessary to enable them to produce. Those questions involve consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary; they involve monopoly.

So, Mr. President, my answer is that I would not know to what committee to refer the resolution, because one standing commitee has as much jurisdiction as another. For that reason I asked to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration. The question was asked, "Why was the resolution creating a permanent committee assigned to the Committee on Rules and Administration?" The answer was the creation of a standing committee involved a change in the rules of the Senate. The statement was made very eloquently yesterday by a distinguished Senator that the creation of a special committee was in violation of the spirit of the Reorganization Act. Every Senator has a right to his own opinion. I agreed when the reorganization bill was considered by the Senate to the inclusion of a provision which would ban special committees. The bill went to the House in that form, and that provision was eliminated. I submit to the President of the Senate and to every Senator that establishing special committees does not violate the spirit of the Reorganization Act.

As I say, I would not know where to send the resolution, so far as the standing committees are concerned.

Mr. TOBEY. If we should continue the committee, the Senator would be, to use the vernacular, "reneging" on his convictions of 2 years ago. The Senator from Nebraska is opposed to special committees, is he not?

Mr. WHERRY. Yes.

Mr. TOBEY. The Senator gave as his dictum last year that he would never ask for a continuance of the Small Business Committee.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a great deal has been said with regard to my not asking for a continuation of the committee. My statement was always predicated on the premise that if and when a standing committee or committees would take over the work of the Small Business Commitee, I would not ask for a further continuance of that committee.

Mr. TOBEY. That time has arrived. It is here.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, at this point I should like to read the statement which I made on March 15, 1948, which is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page 2806. The statement is as follows:

Mr. President, if the Senator making the objection will withhold it for a moment, I should like to explain the purpose of the resolution. It is very necessary that the resolution should be agreed to if the Small Business Committee is to be extended for the remainder of the session. The life of the committee terminates on the 1st day of April. If that is to occur, and if that is what the Senate wants, it is imperative that the personnel of the committee be notified now. The resolution asks for a continuance of the committee for the remainder of this Congress. When this Congress terminates, the committee likewise would terminate. It is not requested that it be extended into the next Congress.

I know that there are those who feel that because it is a special committee it should not be continued. But the Members of the Senate will recall that when the resolution was considered at the last session, a compromise was reached under which the date of termination was fixed at April 1.

At that time I stated—

Here is what I said—that while I felt the committee should be continued until the termination of the Congress—

That is the Eightieth Congress—

if there were no need for it, and if a standing committee had in the meantime taken over the work, I would not ask for its continuance.

Mr. TOBEY. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. WHERRY. Just a moment. I have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. The then minority leader, Mr. BARKLEY, asked this question:

If this resolution should be agreed to, either at this time or under a motion to take it up, which the Senator can make at any time, may we have the assurance that no effort will be made to extend it beyond this Congress?

That meant the Eightieth Congress.

Here is my answer:

It so happens that my term as United States Senator will terminate this year, and it would be rather embarrassing for me to answer that question, inasmuch as I may not be in the Senate next year.

Certainly everything I had to say at that time referred to the Eightieth Congress, not to the Eighty-first Congress. It would have been rather embarrassing for me to answer the question before I went through the campaign.

I read further:

But the same question was raised by some of the Republican Members, and I believe I can say, with assurance, that several Members are in the same position in which the Senator from Kentucky finds himself. They feel that if the committee is to continue it should not be as a special committee; that if it is to continue at all, it should come under the provisions of the Reorganization Act, by action of both Houses.

Some Members took that position, which I think is tenable, to a certain extent.

Personally, I feel it involves a great deal of work, and so far as I am concerned, if it be the will of the Congress to terminate the committee—

I was speaking of the Eightieth Congress—

I should like to have an early vote on it. I personally feel that it should be continued. I again call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky to the fact that I voted for the reorganization plan and that I share in his belief relative to the existence of special committees under the provisions of that act.

I want to say, as sincerely as I possibly can, that there is no standing committee which can take up the work of the Small Business Committee at this time and serve the purpose needed to be served for the small-business man. I should like to see the committee continued until this Congress shall terminate. There will be no more requests from me for any further extension.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I refuse to yield until I finish my remarks. The Senator is not questioning my integrity, is he?

Mr. TOBEY. Oh, no; certainly not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, a question of privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No Senator can interrupt a Senator on the floor without the Senator's consent.

Mr. WHERRY. I said there would be no more requests from me for any further extension of the special committee. My interpretation of what I said, in view of everything I said before, in all the paragraphs of my statement, is simply that if the work of the Special Small Business Committee could be taken over by some other committee I would not ask for the continuance of the Small Business Committee. That time has not yet arrived. The more I have gone into the question, during the past 2 years especially, the more I have become convinced, regardless of any statement to the contrary, that we need a special committee or a standing comittee which will handle the problems of small business. That is my opinion.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire at this time.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, what I took exception to was the side-remark of the Senator. He inquired if I was trying to challenge the sincerity of his remarks. I want to read something which the Senator did not read. It is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 7, 1949. This is the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] speaking:

Mr. President, I also wish to say that I am not asking that the special committee be made a permanent special committee. I see no reason why, in the future, the Senate cannot use for such purposes the Banking and Currency Committee and the other committees which otherwise would handle such problems. For instance, I refer to the Judiciary Committee and the Interstate Commerce Committee as well. When those committees are properly organized they can take care of the subject matter, and then the Senate can terminate the work of the special committee which is proposed by Senate Resolution 20. Because of that fact I have amended the resolution so as to provide for the continuation of the special committee for only 240 days.

The time limit is up. The Senator said only 5 minutes ago, Mr. President, that when a standing committee was ready to take over the work, it should take it over. The Committee on Banking and Currency is the very one to do so. That committee was organized, and its godfather is on the bench and it will begin functioning in very short order for the benefit of small business.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Nebraska has been very lenient with his time in yielding to the Senator from New Hampshire to make a speech on his interpretation of my remarks.

Mr. TOBEY. I have merely read the Senator's speech.

Mr. WHERRY. Let me comment about my remarks. I said:

Does not the Senator further feel—

And so forth. Then we start in with the quotation:

I also wish to say that I am not asking that the special committee be made a permanent special committee.

I never asked that until I joined a few days ago with the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], and that was after I felt that this resolution would not go to the Committee on Rules and Administration as I had hoped it would, and as it should under the precedent already established. I do not care whether it goes by unanimous consent or by motion or in what way it goes.

Two years ago a similar resolution went to the Committee on Rules and Administration, and its reference to that committee established a precedent as to where the pending resolution should go. Whether it is by unanimous consent or otherwise makes no difference at all. The precedent is established.

So I said, in answering the question:

I see no reason why, in the future—

And I see no reason now—

the Senate cannot use for such purposes all of its standing committees if they would set up a subcommittee, each and every one of them, to carry out the work of the special committee.

Let any Senator read the RECORD. Anyone who would interpret it any differently is prejudiced.

Mr. President, I did not intend to take so long, but I am glad to answer these arguments. We may argue about procedure, we may argue about merit, we may argue about the jurisdictional question, but let me tell the Senate that the interpretation of the small-business man will be that if this resolution goes to the Committee on Banking and Currency it will meet the same fate the Murray resolution met. The Murray resolution has been here for several weeks, and not longer ago than a few hours, I was contacted and asked if I would sign a petition to discharge the Committee on Banking and Currency because it failed to act on that resolution.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President——

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator himself well knows that there has been such a movement on the other side of the aisle, and some of us have been solicited to go along with it. I waited for a month and a half. I tried my level best to have the Murray resolution reported; but nothing has been done about it. So the only thing I could do, as chairman of the committee that has been folded up because it terminated, was to submit a resolution asking that it be continued.

I knew when I offered the resolution that it would be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, because that is where the administration here wants it to go.

I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I was merely going to make a suggestion because I know the Senator would wish to be correct. The Murray resolution has not been before the Committee on Banking and Currency for a month and a half.

Mr. WHERRY. I said several weeks.

Mr. MAYBANK. It was offered on January 19.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct.

Mr. MAYBANK. About 2 weeks ago. We have had two regular meetings since, and it was brought up this morning at the second regular meeting, and it was determined to defer action, in view of the appeal pending before the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. I do not disagree with the Senator. I have much respect and affection for the Senator from South Carolina, and I will say to him that if a standing committee of the Senate is to have a small-business subcommittee, that is all right with me.

I know something else that has been done. Request has been made that the committee files of the special committee be turned over to the Senator's committee because they want to proceed with the work, and if that is done, in those files will be found communications, applications, problems, which belong to every other standing committee besides the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. Of course we want the special committee files.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator raised a very important question, with respect to the files. The special committee is dead. Just who has the files?

Mr. WHERRY. Until it is either permanently dead, or is reorganized, it will be up to the Senate to dispose of the files in whatever way the Senate desires to dispose of them. I brought out the fact that the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency expects to take complete jurisdiction of what the Special Small Business Committee has been doing, and that it has asked for the files.

Talk about setting a precedent as to special committees. A precedent is being set here this afternoon, by authorizing one standing committee to reach over the lines of all the other standing committees.

Mr. LUCAS and Mr. MAYBANK addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield and if so to whom?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield to whoever desires to speak.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has to indicate to whom he yields.

Mr. WHERRY. I am glad to yield to the majority leader.

Mr. LUCAS. I raised a question a moment ago about the files. The committee expired on the night of January 31, and somebody has asked for the files. I was asking who would have the files.

Mr. WHERRY. When the Senate takes action and directs that the files should go to any committee, we will be glad to send them.

Mr. LUCAS. I think it is perfectly proper for the Senator to turn over the files.

Mr. WHERRY. Let me complete my remarks.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I wish to comment on what the Senator said about the Small Business Subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency asking for the files. We asked for the files in view of the legislation we were being called upon to study and were studying. If there were any that belonged to the Committee on the Judiciary, certainly the Committee on Banking and Currency would be the first to pass them on.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, all this argument, summed up, is complete support of my position. I realize it is very difficult to override the decision of a distinguished Presiding Officer on an appeal, but if this appeal is lost, there will be no other procedure whereby I can have this resolution referred to any other committee. It will be gone, and to my mind I think it is through now. I appreciate what the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency has said, but in my opinion it is through.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President——

Mr. WHERRY. I do not yield now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield further.

Mr. WHERRY. If the Senate today sustains the ruling of the Chair, then what the Senate really is doing is permitting a subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency to be given authority to continue the work of the Small Business Committee in all its various fields, and when that is done, it either by assumption or by acquiescence gives to a standing committee more authority than ever was intended in the Reorganization Act. So I have asked that the resolution go to the Committee on Rules and Administration. I agree with the Senator from Connecticut that it is an administrative matter. I think it should go there, because a resolution was submitted by the Senator from Florida, setting up a permanent standing Small Business Committee, in submitting which he permitted me to join as a cosponsor last night, and that resolution was sent to the Committee on Rules and Administration, and properly so.

Of course that must be the rule, if we want to be technical about the matter, but in this instance there is no other way to have the resolution referred to another committee except by taking the course I have pursued. In doing so I cast no reflection upon the President of the Senate, none whatever. Whatever decision he makes, of course, that is his decision.

Mr. President, the businessmen of the country are looking to what the Senate is going to do this very afternoon with respect to continuing the special Committee on Small Business. My opinion is that a vote to sustain the appeal means that the committee is killed, and a vote not to sustain the appeal means that the resolution will be sent to the Committee on Rules and Administration, where it will receive favorable consideration and have a chance to be reported to the Senate, and then, either as a special committee, or as a permanent committee under the Holland resolution, we can go forward with a committee which is duly authorized, which has the authority to handle the problems of small business. That is the whole thing in a nutshell.

Senators can speak about procedure; they can speak about politics; they can speak about anything. All I want is to have the Small Business Committee continued. I have said I will support the Murray resolution; I have said I will support the Holland resolution; and, of course, I shall support the resolution I have submitted.

Mr. DONNELL and Mr. TOBEY addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Before recognizing any other Senators the Chair wishes to make a statement in response to a suggestion by the Senator from Nebraska a moment ago in debate when he stated that the Chair referred the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency because the administration wanted it sent there. The Chair does not know just what implication was in the Senator's mind when he made that statement. But the administration as such, either outside the Senate or in the Senate, has made no suggestion to the Chair as to how he should rule on the resolution. The Chair made his ruling on his own interpretation of the rules, and after consultation with the Parliamentarian of the Senate, for whom the Chair is sure every Senator has respect. No administration representative, inside or outside the Senate, has the slightest influence or would have the slightest influence on the Chair in passing upon a rule of this sort.

Mr. DONNELL and Mr. TOBEY again addressed the Chair.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, may I reply to the statement just made by the Presiding Officer?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Nebraska for that purpose.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Chair for calling the matter to my attention. I did not mean for one moment that the present occupant of the Chair had been asked by the administration to send the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency and that he complied with such a request. It is my opinion that the administration wanted the resolution sent to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the administration had any such desire it never communicated it to the Chair.

The Senator from Missouri is now recognized.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, it seems to me that the argument that the resolution should be sent to the Committee on Rules and Administration because it would be more favorably received there than in the Committee on Banking and Currency is not a proper consideration for either the Presiding Officer or the Senate. The same point was made yesterday. For instance, at page 839 of the RECORD the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], the minority leader, said:

My appeal is that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, because it is my opinion that if the resolution goes to the Banking and Currency Committee, it will meet the same fate as that of the so-called Murray resolution which now is before that committee.

A few minutes ago the Senator from Nebraska again in substance said that the only way that he could get the resolution before a committee in which he would obtain favorable action is the course which he is now following, which is to appeal from the ruling of the Chair and seek to cause the resolution to be sent to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Earlier this afternoon the Senator from Nebraska in substance said that he is asking that the resolution go to the Committee on Rules and Administration where, as he said in substance, the resolution will receive more favorable consideration.

Mr. President, before addressing myself to what is the real question in this matter, I would like very briefly to express myself as being in opposition to the view that the reception that is to be accorded by a particular committee to a given resolution shall determine which committee it is to which the resolution shall be referred. As I see it, the Presiding Officer should not base his position upon any such question as that. The rules of the Senate presumably direct the Presiding Officer as to the committee to which reference should be made. Of course he realizes, as do we all, that in numerous instances it is difficult to determine to which committee the reference should be made. There are many cases, as was pointed out last year by the preceding Presiding Officer of the Senate, in which more than one committee may well be argued to have jurisdiction. The La Follette-Monroney Act clearly recognizes, as the Chair pointed out yesterday, and as was pointed out in debate, that cases may arise in which there will be controversy as to which committee shall have the resolution referred to it. Section 137 of that act of the Congress, the La Follette-Monroney Act, provides:

In any case in which a controversy arises as to the jurisdiction of any standing committee of the Senate with respect to any proposed legislation, the question of jurisdiction shall be decided by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, without debate, in favor of that committee—that committee which has jurisdiction over the subject matter which predominates in such proposed legislation.

So, Mr. President, clearly the La Follette-Monroney Act, under which we operate, namely, Public Law 601 of the Seventy-ninth Congress, recognizes the probability of cases arising in which a reference may be made, or may be claimed to be subject to being made, to more than one committee.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the question involved here is comparatively simple. The Chair has referred the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency. An appeal has been taken from the action of the Chair on the ground that the reference was improper, and the proponent of the appeal has taken the view that the reference should have been made to the Committee on Rules and Administration. On yesterday he said at page 838 of the RECORD:

I should like to present my observations as to why I feel this resolution should go to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

And again on page 839 he said:

I believe the time has come when a resolution so providing—

That is, providing as his does—should be presented to the Committee on Rules and Administration, which I contend has proper jurisdiction of the matter.

Now, Mr. President, the question before the Senate is the same question that was before the Presiding Officer before he ruled, and that is, under the rules of the Senate to which committee should the reference be made? We are not undertaking here this afternoon to decide the merits of the resolution; not to decide whether a special committee should be set up; not to decide whether the functions of that special committee should embrace the various projects and purposes set forth in the resolution. The only question now before the Senate is that with which the Presiding Officer was confronted, namely, to which committee, under the rules of the Senate, should the reference be made?

I have studied as best I could, after hearing this question raised, the contents of the rules as I see them that are applicable to the situation. I have studied as best I could the provisions of the Senate's rules in the endeavor to find out to which committee the resolution the Senator from Nebraska has submitted should have been referred. I have been aware of the proposition asserted by the Senator from Nebraska, as I have indicated from the RECORD, that it is the Committee on Rules and Administration to which reference should be made. I have searched the provisions of the La Follette-Monroney Act to ascertain the particular portion of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules and Administration which, in the opinion of the Senate, could justify sending this resolution to the Committee on Rules and Administration, or make mandatory such reference.

A great variety of subjects is embraced in the rule relative to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules and Administration. Obviously, many of them have no applicability whatsoever—for illustration—

Matters relating to the Library of Congress and the Senate Library; statuary and pictures; acceptance or purchase of works of art for the Capitol; the Botanic Gardens; management of the Library of Congress—

And a number of others which I need not detail, which clearly have no possible connection with the resolution now before us.

There are two provisions in the rule relative to jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules and Administration to which I have addressed myself—I trust with reasonable care. One of those items of subject matter embraced in the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules and Administration is:

Matters relating to parliamentary rules.

It seems to me that the resolution now before us clearly is not one which is embraced within the term "matters relating to parliamentary rules." I see nothing in the resolution which could bring it within the term "matters relating to parliamentary rules."

I searched further in the provisions of the La Follette-Monroney Act to see what other basis of jurisdiction the Committee on Rules and Administration could have. The only thing I could find, by a somewhat careful search of the rules, is this:

Matters relating to the payment of money out of the contingent fund of the Senate or creating a charge upon the same.

I observe that in the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska there is a sentence which reads as follows:

The expense of the committee, which shall not exceed $———, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

It may be that at first glance one would say that the Committee on Rules and Administration has jurisdiction over this subject matter because there is a provision in the Wherry resolution which relates to the payment of money out of the contingent fund of the Senate, or creating a charge upon that fund. But when we study the resolution, as was so eloquently and clearly described and set forth yesterday, and argued by the Senator from Nebraska, it seems to me that clearly the matter of the payment of money out of the contingent fund of the Senate, or the creation of a charge upon that fund, is not the predominant subject matter of the resolution.

In the first place, the resolution, as set forth in yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, consists of language which covers substantially one entire column of small type. The entire portion which relates to a charge upon the contingent fund of the Senate is contained in one sentence in that entire column. I believe that from the standpoint of the mere matter of space, there is at least a hint that the charge upon the contingent fund of the Senate is not the predominant purpose of the matter contained in the resolution. That hint is well justified and corroborated by reading the resolution. I shall not read it because it would take too much time; but I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the committee which the resolution undertakes to create, and to which various authorities and directions would be given, is—

To conduct a study, by means of research and investigation, of the existing or future problems of American independent small business, including but not limited to the following problems.

Then follows a series of eight specific problems which are set forth. I mention only two or three of them.

(1) Supply and distribution of basic industrial materials with particular reference to whether or not independent small business is obtaining its fair share of such materials under existing or future distribution methods and patterns.

(2) Policies of Federal Government departments, agencies, and corporations with respect to inclusion of independent small business in their present programs and future planning with particular reference to the procurement activities of such departments, agencies, and corporations.

(3) Prices charged for materials needed and utilized by independent small business to determine whether they are fair and equitable in relation to prices charged their larger competitors.

Now that I have gone thus far, I may be permitted to mention the remaining purposes which this committee, if it should be created, would carry out.

(4) Pressures of vertically and horizontally integrated combinations to eliminate independent small business in the American industrial distributive system.

(5) Inability of both new and old independent small business to adequately finance itself from its own earnings due to tax structure and effect of such tax structure on the merger movement.

(6) Participation of independent American small business in foreign-aid programs and adequacy of representation of independent small business by diplomatic and consular officials abroad.

(7) Development of program to adequately insure independent small business a fair share of raw and finished materials and services produced on and from publicly owned mineral resources, forest reserves, and irrigation and reclamation projects.

Finally—

(8) Development of a sound program to safeguard the place of independent small business in the American economy.

Is it not too clear to require further argument that the provision about the payment of expenses from the contingent fund is merely minor and incidental—although very important, of course—to the larger purposes the consummation of which the appropriation of such money is intended to effectuate?

It seems to me that every one of the provisions which I have read relates to financial aid to commerce and industry, particularly, and perhaps almost, if not entirely, exclusively, with relation to small business. The language of the rule relating to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency is:

Financial aid to commerce and industry, other than matters relating to such aid which are specifically assigned to other committees under this rule.

Financial aid to commerce and industry, to which I have referred, is a subject matter within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency, as set forth in rule XXV of the standing rules of the Senate, under the La Follette-Monroney Act.

So if it be contended—as it has been by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska—that more than one purpose is set forth in the resolution, if we come to that question, I say that certainly it cannot be successfully contended that the mere charge of the expense of all these purposes to the contingent fund of the Senate is a predominating subject matter of the resolution.

So, Mr. President, we have a case very clearly for applicability of section 137 which makes it the duty of the Presiding Officer to decide the question of jurisdiction in favor of the Committee on Banking and Currency. It may be that some of the subject matters to which reference is made, and which I have read this afternoon, constitute matters which may properly come within the purview and jurisdiction of other committees of the Senate. But obviously every one of them comes within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The question raised by the Senator from Nebraska in his own mind is as between the Committee on Rules and Administration on the one hand and the Committee on Banking and Currency on the other. It seems perfectly clear to me that under the contention of the Senator from Nebraska it is undoubtedly true that the subject matter which predominates in his resolution is that which comes clearly within the jurisdictional matter placed within the functions of the Committee on Banking and Currency by the La Follette-Monroney Act. So, Mr. President, it seems to me, first, that the question whether or not this resolution would fare better in one committee or the other is not the question before the Senate, any more than it was the question before the Presiding Officer.

Second, the real question, and the only question before the Senate in connection with this particular resolution, is, To what committee should the Presiding Officer have referred the resolution? Should he have referred it to the Banking and Currency Committee or to some other committee? It seems to me, Mr. President, most respectfully, that none of the arguments adduced tend even remotely, to convince one that the Chair erred in referring this resolution to the Banking and Currency Committee. I earnestly believe, and shall support that belief with my vote, that the President of the Senate ruled correctly in referring the resolution to the Banking and Currency Committee; and I submit that the appeal which has been respectfully presented by the Senator from Nebraska with all the earnestness he commands, and in view of his great interest in small business, in which so many of us join, should not be sustained by the Senate.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I shall be very brief. The Senator from Missouri has eloquently summed up the situation, and I concur 100 percent in his remarks.

In all kindness to my friend, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], I wish to quote statements made by him on two occasions, one when a few minutes ago he said, if I correctly jotted down his words:

If you do away with the special committee, you will be giving a standing committee more power than it should have or ever has had before.

That is his statement regarding the dire effect which he anticipates if we take that step.

Yet here is the Senator from Nebraska speaking of the effect, in another instance:

Mr. President, I also wish to say that I am not asking that the special committee be made a permanent special committee. I see no reason why, in the future, the Senate cannot use for such purposes the Banking and Currency Committee and the other committees which otherwise would handle such problems.

When those committees are properly organized they can take care of the subject matter, and then the Senate can terminate the work of the special committee which is proposed by Senate Resolution 20.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I wish to speak very briefly to the subject, because I suspect that the way I shall vote on this little matter will please few of those who have been writing to me, and will displease more.

Let me say that it seems to me one would need the wisdom of Solomon to correctly refer this resolution. I likewise, as did my friend the Senator from Missouri, examined the Reorganization Act, and found myself in somewhat more doubt as to where the resolution should be referred, because it seemed to me that the question is, not whether the subjects covered by the resolution shall lie in the purview of the Banking and Currency Committee, but how they should be handled. So the issue presented by the reference to the Banking and Currency Committee is not a clear-cut one.

Furthermore, if I correctly understand the situation, the chair is perhaps in the somewhat embarrasing position of having referred three resolutions relating to this matter, two of them to the Banking and Currency Committee, and one to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Out of this somewhat confused situation, it seems to me that my own course in voting is clear, and it has been made clear by the assurance of the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee that the resolution will not be allowed to languish behind the closed doors of that committee, but will be brought back to this floor within a very short period of time.

That being the case, Mr. President, it seems to me that most of the time we have spent in talking about this matter has been—and I do not say this in criticism of anyone—largely wasted, for this resolution will be presented on the floor of the Senate; it will come back here, perhaps with a report which will be either favorable or unfavorable; but at any rate we shall have a chance to decide here, within a very few days, what shall be done.

Since the President of the Senate has made his reference of the resolution and since it seems to me, in view of the assurances given, that the question of the committee to which the resolution should be referred is not too important, and since we can do with the resolution what we will when it returns here, I shall vote to sustain the decision of the Chair.

Mr. PEPPER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia.

He is not in the Chamber. The Chair promised to recognize him for a moment.

The Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wish to take only a few minutes of the time of the Senate.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon will state it.

Mr. MORSE. I did not catch the Chair's observation in regard to having promised to recognize some Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] was seeking to introduce a bill, and the Chair persuaded him to wait until the debate concluded, or at least until the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Vermont concluded their remarks. The Chair was merely seeking to carry out that obligation.

Mr. MORSE. Is the junior Senator from Oregon correct in his understanding that the rule is that Senators should be recognized in the order in which they address the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Senator is not correct.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield for the purpose of permitting the propounding of a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I am very anxious to complete my remarks and be able to leave the floor of the Senate. If the Senator from Oregon will indulge me, I should prefer not to yield for a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida declines to yield.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the greatest threat to American democracy is the concentration of economic power in the hands of a few giant corporations. There has been a constant increase in the importance of these huge corporations, and there has been a decline in that of small-business concerns. More than 500,000 small-business men were forced out of business during the war years. Today the 250 largest corporations in the United States own about two-thirds of the Nation's usable manufacturing facilities. At the beginning of 1948, 113 manufacturing companies, each with assets of more than $100,000,000, owned 50 percent of the Nation's entire manufacturing property, plant and equipment. Seventy thousand others owned the other 50 percent. About 2 percent of our manufacturing concerns employed 60 percent of all the industrial workers.

So, Mr. President, I thoroughly believe in the re-creation of the special Committee on Small Business, which has done such excellent work since its establishment in 1940, at the instance and by the initiative of the able senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], my esteemed neighbor in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the body of the RECORD, at the conclusion of my remarks, a list of publications issued by the Special Committee To Study the Problems of American Small Business, dated October 10, 1946. This publication will show altogether almost six entire pages of various publications which were issued by the Senate Special Committee on Small Business during its tenure. So I ask unanimous consent that the list may be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, in addition, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the body of the RECORD, following the printing of the list of publications to which I have just adverted, a statement by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] of reasons for the continuance of the Senate Small Business Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit B.)

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, that document states ably and succinctly the justification for the continuance of the Special Committee on Small Business, which has served very well not only the Senate but the country in the more than 8 years of its existence since its establishment in 1940, as I have said, as a result of the initiative and farsightedness of the Senator from Montana. So, Mr. President, I very strongly believe the Senate should recreate a Special Committee on Small Business. I believe when a small-business man living in any of the States thinks in terms of somebody in Washington who might be able to help him with his small-business problem he primarily thinks of one of the special committees in the Congress on small business, the Special Committee on Small Business in the House of Representatives, under the able chairmanship of Mr. WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas, who was, I believe, the author of the resolution creating the special committee in the House, and the Special Committee on Small Business of the Senate. If a businessman of small stature gets into trouble and writes a letter to Washington to the Small Business Committee of Congress, that letter would go to one or the other of those special committees. But, Mr. President, if the only agency of the Senate—because the House has already re-created its Special Committee on Small Business—if the only agency in the Senate dealing with that subject is a subcommittee, that troubled small-business man in the country does not know whom to write. I merely believe he will have a feeling that a source of help upon which he has depended, and with considerable confidence and credit to the committee in the past, will be taken away from him.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield for a question.

Mr. CAPEHART. Does not the able Senator from Florida feel that a committee within the Committee on Banking and Currency with the same number of dollars, with the same sized staff, manned by five or seven Senators, would be able to do just as good a job as a special committee?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I think in the debate the answer has already been given to that question. In the first place there is no single committee in the Senate which has exclusive jurisdiction over the problems of small business. The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee might with almost equal propriety be said to have the same problems before it, and the Senate Committee on Finance has one of the important aspects of the matter within its jurisdiction, namely, the tax feature with respect to small business.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I should like to finish the answer, if I may. That is the first answer. The second answer is that a special committee, while it no doubt has its vices, has also its peculiar virtues. The members who are on such a committee ordinarily have a considerable interest and sometimes zeal for the prosecution of problems with which the committee was created to deal. I am sure that would be true of the able Senator of Montana, if he were to continue as chairman of it, as he was under the Democratic regime in the Senate. No doubt Senators specially interested in the problem would make request for appointment by the President of the Senate to membership on the committee.

In the third place, a special committee not restricted to a particular jurisdiction is seldom limited to a particular point of view. It realizes this problem is one which concerns almost every general committee in the Senate. It would take a broad perspective of the problem, and would try to formulate a comprehensive program which might be the subject of recommendation to appropriate committees thereafter. So, while as I say, I think special committees are not to be too much encouraged, and while, as a member of the Reorganization Committee of the Congress, I was in accord with the recommendations first made by that committee to exclude special committees altogether, yet, since the Congress did not see fit to adopt the committee's recommendation, and since there was no such inclusion in the final law, due to the fact that the House of Representatives did not concur in the prohibition that was in the version of the bill passed by the Senate, of course Congress itself chose to leave the respective bodies free to set up special committees when in their respective wisdoms they might see fit to do so.

While opinions might differ, those are the general reasons which impel me to believe on that question alone in the desirability of the continuity of the special committee on small business. I do not hesitate to say to my colleagues on this side of the aisle that since the Democrats, recognizing this problem, initiated the special committee, I do not see any inconsistency in our continuing it, now that we are again in the majority in the Senate. As I said, the House has already created a special committee on small business. But, as much as anything else, the special committee is a symbol to the small-business men of the country. For more than 8 years the small-business man has repeatedly turned to a special committee on small business in the Senate or House, and he has obtained a considerable measure of relief, because this was a general matter which a special committee could approach with a little more perspective than any standing committee might have the opportunity to do.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I am anxious to allow other Senators to be heard, but I shall yield to the Senator again, because I certainly do not want to deny him an opportunity to ask any other questions. I shall appreciate it if the Senator will ask what he started to ask a moment ago.

Mr. CAPEHART. I simply wanted to ask, is it not a fact that the special committee has no legislative authority and therefore cannot initiate legislation?

Mr. PEPPER. That is correct; and, if the Senator will allow me to answer, no general committee in the Senate has legislative jurisdiction over the whole matter that needs to be attacked.

Mr. CAPEHART. That is very true. All the special committee can do is to hold hearings and investigate. That is all in the world the special committee can do, besides answering letters from small-business men and giving them personal help. I have been a member of the committee for 4 years. I know of its plans, I know of its work. Under no circumstances would I ever vote to discontinue the Small Business Committee of the Senate. But my position is that it can be handled equally well, possibly better, by a subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency, providing the subcommittee is given the same amount of money and has the same staff, and provided there is the same interest in it as there is on the part of members of a special committee; which I am certain there would be.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I should like to make this observation: As I said, there are perhaps a score of things at the moment that should be done to afford additional relief to small business.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one moment? It will not take 30 seconds.

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. I merely want to point out to my friend from Florida the fact that 2 years ago he was one of the Senators on the other side of the aisle who voted against a continuation of the Special Committee on Small Business.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator is absolutely correct. I am glad he brought that up, because I was going to bring it up myself, so I would not appear in a contradictory or inconsistent position. But, if I may, I shall finish my answer to the able Senator from Indiana. I say, let us suppose there are at a minimum 20 different things that should be done in the near future to aid small business. It is unlikely it seems to me that the standing committees of the Senate, 15 in number, are likely to carry on a contemporaneous inquiry into what should be done to aid small business. It is very unlikely those committees would take up this subject at even anything like the same time. It is unlikely that a comprehensive program would come from a standing committee of the Senate, which will tend to meet the challenging problems of small business. Especially is that so, if it is more or less generally recognized that one of the committees, namely, the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, is taking the initiative in that field, and——

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. Excuse me; let me finish my sentence—and that any other committee might perhaps be infringing a little bit or encroaching somewhat upon the initiative and jurisdiction of the committee. I now yield to the Senator.

Mr. CAPEHART. I agree 100 percent with the able Senator, unless the Senate gives the subcommitee of the Committee on Banking and Currency the same amount of money which would be given a special committee, and unless the Senate gives them the same kind and type of staff as is given to a special committee. Unless we do that, I should be opposed to a subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency handling the matter, but there is no reason why the Senate should not be just as willing to give a subcommittee as much money and as large a staff as it gives to a special committee.

Mr. PEPPER. But would not the Senator have to add one more condition? The Senator has said the standing committee should have the same amount of money as the special committee, it should have a staff of the same size and caliber. Would not the Senator have to ask also for the same breadth of jurisdiction as the special committee would have?

Mr. CAPEHART. My opinion is the Committee on Banking and Currency at the moment could make the same sort and type of inquiries that the Senate Small Business Committee could make. I think they have that authority at the moment.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I have expressed the idea that the other committees would be a little hesitant about initiating an inquiry if one committee had already announced that it had received a special allocation of funds for the making of such an inquiry or investigation. I have been addressing myself to a matter which I want to make very clearly of record, and that is that I favor the principle of a continuation of the Special Committee on Small Business in the Senate.

Let me advert to what was suggested by the able Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY]. Two years ago I was one of the Senators who voted against a continuation of that special committee. We were in the midst of our first session of the Congress after the enactment of the Reorganization Act. I wanted to preserve as much as possible the spirit as well as the letter of the Reorganization Act. But we have learned by experience. In 2 years' time some things have caused us to take a different attitude from the one we took 2 years ago. For example, it was discovered in the Democratic council a few days ago that it was not feasible to report a legislative budget by the 15th of February, as the Reorganization Act requires. I have heard of no opposition from the minority side to the position of the majority that it was not found feasible to report a legislative budget by the 15th of February. So that led us to defer the filing of the legislative budget until a later time. I do not know what date has finally been fixed. If that matter had come up 2 years ago, I venture to say a different position would have been taken, because we did not know at that time whether it was altogether feasible and practicable to observe the literal requirements of the Reorganization Act. I think that in 2 years' time a Senator should be open to learning something. I should not care to have it said that I had not learned something in the past 2 years.

In view of the fact that the House struck out the prohibition in the Reorganization Act excluding special committees, now that the House has continuously had a special committee on small business, now that the Senate, against my vote 2 years ago, continued the special committee, I am not disposed now to cut them off.

So, Mr. President, I think the Senators who voted the other way 2 years ago are not at all to be charged with improper inconsistency. I am sure we shall not find applicable the admonition of the sage of New England, who said:

> A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines.

Mr. President, I want to make it clear as to how I stand upon this issue, but it does not lead me to favor the position of my distinguished friend the minority leader in this matter. I think the Chair has ruled correctly. I think a reading of the rule which defines the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules and Administration makes it obligatory for the Chair to refer the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency. In view of the fact that if the special committee is created it will be a charge upon the contingent fund of the Senate, it would be equally necessary for the Chair to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules and Administration. So certainly not only shall I not hope to override the Chair, but I shall welcome an opportunity to confirm the rightness of the Chair's ruling. However, I go further and say that if the Banking and Currency Committee should not report the resolution favorably, and the subject comes up again, I certainly shall vote on the floor to create a committee on small business as a special committee. But I think attention should be called to the fact that before the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska was offered, the resolution offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], who was the original sponsor of the special committee on small business, had already been offered and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. It certainly would not be proper or consistent for the Chair to have referred an identical resolution to another committee.

So, Mr. President, I am hopeful that we shall get what the Senator from Nebraska has in mind. On the merits of the matter I am very much in accord with him and the Senator from Montana. I think that probably another opportunity will be afforded. I am sure it can be worked out in some way for the Senate to continue its Committee on Small Business as a special committee.

EXHIBIT B

STATEMENT BY SENATOR JAMES E. MURRAY

REASONS FOR THE CONTINUANCE OF THE SENATE SMALL BUSINESS COMMITTEE

Independent and small businesses need this committee because of present abnormal economic conditions

As changing conditions in the Government and the economy have required, the Senate Small Business Committee has focused its work on the solution of those problems which affect the survival and growth of independent and small business. Consequently, it has come to mean a great deal to the independent business community in every State of the Nation. Today when business hazards are mounting, these businessmen need the Senate Small Business Committee as never before. Here are some illustrations:

1. The Federal Government is the biggest single buyer in the country. All its experience, bureaucratic tradition, and the desire to get the job done the easiest way point toward big purchases from big business. For example, the Defense Establishment will buy some $15,000,000,000 of goods this next year. It has no adequate machinery for contracting with small and independent businesses. On its own it apparently is not inclined to do so. Yet at least $5,000,000,000 of all its purchases should go to such businesses, which would spell the difference between a healthy situation and one where many of these smaller business firms will sustain losses or fail.

The Senate Small Business Committee has proven by its wartime efforts in forcing the services to establish purchasing practices equally fair to small and big business, and in continuing to police these practices and to break bottlenecks as they occur, keeping the procurement program constantly under scrutiny, that this is the only practical way of insuring a square deal for independent and small business. Experience has shown that only the surveillance of a Senate Committee having a full-time staff and possessed of the powers of subpena and public hearings gets the job done well.

All but a very few of the Members of the Senate have used the specialized service of the Senate Small Business Committee in behalf of their constituent small businesses. This saves the Senators much time and gives them expert help. Because of the respect of Government agencies for the effectiveness of the committee, the work has received high commendation. The practice has developed of not only getting action on individual cases, but of using them to illustrate the need for correct procurement and contracting policies, to the end that the Government agencies eventually establish them.

2. Major shortages continue to menace independent and small business. For example, thousands of fabricators of steel and aluminum products cannot get their normal amounts of these basic raw materials, and are prevented from developing prosperous expanding businesses during good times, laying up the needed reserves against any eventualities—all because of raw-materials shortages entirely beyond their individual control.

The Senate Small Business Committee has held hearings and conferences over several years, repeating them as necessary, to get a better break for these small concerns from their suppliers who are at the same time their competitors. Often only the threat of publicity, and possible imposition of compulsory controls, suffice to bring about fairer treatment. Pressure has to be kept on almost continuously to force some big-business operators to dribble out supplies of raw materials to these independent and small concerns. The files of the committee and the remarks of many Senators give ample proof that this service is a most important tangible help to American small business during these times of abnormal scarcities of needed raw materials.

3. Large integrated companies are in a position to put the "squeeze" on small or independent suppliers during these days of full use of resources, which an alert Senate Small Business Committee can and does prevent. An example of such effort is the recent case of the independent oil companies in California whose crude oil can only be processed if refineries operated by the large integrated corporations will process it. In normal times this is no problem. But now the large corporations refused to accept more than a small fraction of the usual amount of crude oil from the independent companies. The Senate Small Business Committee was asked to investigate and take appropriate action. A 1-day hearing was sufficient to force the big corporations to halt their detrimental action and reinstall former practices, resulting in savings of many thousands of dollars to the small independents.

4. Grey and black markets are a serious menace in these times of materials shortages. The Senate Small Business Committee uncovered an active grey market in steel, and its hearings and watchful oversight of the situation have materially reduced such harmful activities, to the lasting benefit of many small businesses.

5. A large export program is underwritten by the Government through the European recovery program. American independent and small business has never received its rightful share of attention in the procurement programs which use our taxpayers' dollars. Only a beginning effort has been made by the Senate Small Business Committee to insure fair procedures and practices in such purchases. Much yet remains to be done in this connection if the remaining 3 years of ECA are to benefit our independent business community as they should.

6. Export controls and policies have never been developed with the peculiar problems of small and independent business in mind. These important elements in our business community are discriminated against by the Government and the purchasing missions of foreign governments. The Senate Small Business Committee has begun an investigation of such conditions, and if allowed to complete its work will force through changes in policies and procedures which will give small business fair treatment.

7. A substantial program of plant expansion is now contemplated in the interest of national defense, urged by the administration and particularly advocated by the President. Included are programs to develop vastly more hydroelectric power, steel, aluminum, and strategic metals such as copper, chrome, and manganese. Special consideration should be given, also, to the need for an increased supply of wood pulp for newsprint.

Much of the preliminary work of investigation to establish the need for such expansion has already been done by the Senate Small Business Committee. Its steel investigation, and the report, Steel Supply and Distribution Problems, made by Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, the first chairman of the committee, have been a major factor in focusing attention on this situation. The work has only been partly done. The committee contemplates further study and active participation in the formulation of any proposed legislation to carry out the recommendations of the President. It intends that such legislation will not increase the concentration of economic power but provide for a wider degree of competition as the only business atmosphere in which small and independent business can operate successfully. Therefore, it is imperative to have the Senate Small Business Committee continued during the Eighty-first Congress when these decisions on plant expansion will be made.

The administration and the Democratic Party are pledged to the continuance of the Senate Small Business Committee

The President of the United States, in his campaign for election, pledged his administration to a vigorous program specifically directed toward the peculiar and particular needs of independent and small business. The National Committee of the Democratic Party established an Independent Business Committee for Truman and Barkley and the Democratic Candidates, and issued literature directing the attention of the business people of the Nation to the record in their behalf as made by the Democrats. That record was pointed up largely in terms of the work of the congressional Small Business Committees. The Democratic Party pledged itself to continue these efforts in behalf of independent and small business. This effort played no small part in the successful outcome of the November elections.

After the election, Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, long-time chairman of the Senate Small Business Committee, called upon the President to ascertain his views concerning the continuance of the committee. President Truman was emphatic in his endorsement of the committee and insistence that it be continued during the Eighty-first Congress.

Senator HOWARD MCGRATH, who, as Democratic National Committee chairman, had set up the independent and small business committee referred to above and has testified to its great contribution in the campaign, has informed Senator MURRAY that he unequivocally endorses the Senate Small Business Committee and urges its continuance as a partial fulfillment of the party's pledge to the voters. Numerous other Senators have indicated their support for continuance of the committee.

The continuance of the Senate Small Business Committee does not contravene either the spirit or practice of the reorganization bill

Mention has been made that continuance of the Senate Small Business Committee might be in contradiction to the Reorganization Act. That act contemplated keeping special committees to a minimum, permitting subcommittees of standing committees to do particular tasks of short duration for which special committees are usually set up.

The Senate Small Business Committee's work overlaps the legislative interest of several standing committees. That work does not primarily, nor necessarily, lead directly to legislation. When it does (as witness the record of its accomplishment in the passage of such substantial contributions as the Smaller War Plants Corporation, the Surplus Property Act, and the Full Employment Act, and several other measures designed to aid small business directly, such as access roads to small mines, and stock piling of strategic materials), the investigating work done by the committee is made use of directly in the hearings on proposed legislation held by the appropriate standing committees. This is not duplication of effort, but on the contrary speeds up the legislative process, for a phase of legislation, that of the investigation of the problem in all its ramifications, has already been done and a considerable understanding has developed upon which specific legislation can be built and hearings conducted.

But the peculiar importance of the Senate Small Business Committee is that the independent business community of the Nation knows it has a committee in the Senate avowedly concerned with its manifold problems. In this day and age, when the encroachments of large corporations into all fields of economic endeavor threatens the very life of the free competitive-enterprise system which is the foundation of our cherished American institutions, it is not too much to expect that the Senate of the United States would be sufficiently interested in the problems of independent and small business to maintain a committee devoting full time to investigating these problems and their solution.

The work of the Senate Small Business Committee, while often leading to legislation, is in very considerable measure concerned with the effectiveness of legislation already passed and being administered by the administrative branch of the Government. This work, as has been pointed out above, overlaps the special province of any one standing legislative committee. Moreover, and this is of substantive importance, it is of a character that is considerably beyond the scope and experience of standing committees or their staffs. It calls for specialized experience and requires experts trained in investigation and negotiation in a broad field of business, economics, and government administration, all of which is pointed up in terms of the specific interests of independent and small business. To include such work as a part of the effort of a standing committee would be to overshadow that committee's customary effort, for the volume of work done by the Senate Small Business Committee, the demands on its time and staff, are considerably greater than that required by the usual standing committee in the course of its legislative work.

The work of the Senate Small Business Committee does not duplicate in any noticeable way any work now being done or contemplated by standing legislative committees. It has an important field all to itself, and over the years the dependence of the business community at large upon it furnishes ample proof that this is a field of congressional activity very much in the public interest and demand. If the committee should be discontinued, and some subcommittee of a standing committee be given its assignments, not only would it distort the work of the standing committee, but no savings in time of Senators, or in funds would be made, unless it is the intention by such action to deliberately destroy the effectiveness of the program being carried on in behalf of independent and small business. That has never been suggested as a purpose behind any move to discontinue the Senate Small Business Committee and tuck its effort away as a subcommittee activity of a standing legislative committee. But American business men and women who have contacted the members and staff of the Senate Small Business Committee view with alarm any such move, for they fear that this is just another way of curtailing, stifling, and eventually killing the program in behalf of independent and small business.

The Reorganization Act has been in effect long enough now to have settled into the fabric of congressional organization. Consequently, no rash of new special committees will break out if the decision is made to continue the Senate Small Business Committee. For it is widely recognized that this committee is of a very special character and therefore does not fit into the pattern of subcommittees of standing committees, whereas all the special investigations sought can be organized expeditiously that way.

The House of Representatives is continuing its Special Committee on Small Business. If the Senate Committee is not continued, there results a lopsided arrangement, where Members of the Senate will have to refer the problems of their small-business constituents to the House for action, action which is entirely beyond their control and cannot be fitted into their own efforts in behalf of their constituents. The House of Representatives sees nothing in the continuance of its Small Business Committee which is disturbing to the effectiveness of the Reorganization Act.

The work of the committee is practical—it is aimed to make certain that independent and small business comes through this unnatural postwar period of inflation and shortages as well as is possible, to the end that competitive business will survive and grow strong. This work is divided into two, not completely distinct parts: (1) Those investigations, negotiations, hearings, and meetings which result in independent and small business receiving fair and equal treatment with big business competitors in relationships with the Government, and (2) an investigation of those fundamental and long-range problems which restrict competition and strengthen monopoly practices to the detriment of independent business.

Specifically, the Senate Small Business Committee intends working in the following areas:

1. Small business participation in Government procurement (military, research and development, and normal procurement programs).

2. Small business participation in international trade (ECA, export-control policies, etc.).

3. Breaking the bottlenecks of scarce materials for small business (steel, aluminum, newsprint, power, etc.).

4. Small business participation in the plant expansion and development program launched by the Government as a defense and economy plan.

5. Small business participation in the program of development and stock piling of strategic metals and materials.

6. The antitrust laws and practices of the agencies (Federal Trade Commission, Department of Justice, Department of Commerce, and Department of Labor) as they affect small business.

7. Accounting, statistics and reports required by the Government and their effect on small business.

8. Transportation problems of small business.

9. Small business interest in the surplus property disposal program.

10. Financial problems of small business (equity, capital taxation).

The continuance of the Small Business Committee has widespread support

Any attempt to discontinue the Senate Small Business Committee, or to tuck it away as a subcommittee of a standing legislative committee, will meet with the greatest disfavor of many thousands of American businessmen scattered widely over the Nation. They have come to expect its services as necessary in their behalf, as one small means of balancing the scales in comparison to their powerful big business rivals. They have repeatedly given the finest commendations of its work. Its continuance has been pledged them by responsible leaders in the Congress and the administration.

No attempt has been made to assemble any pressure, or to allow any pressure to be exerted in behalf of continuance of the committee, for that has such obvious merit that no such pressure would appear to be required. It is recommended, therefore, that full support be given the resolution being introduced to continue the committee during the 81st Congress.

ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY SCHOOLS, COAUTHOR OF BILL

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, on the 10th of January I introduced Senate bill 287 to provide for grants to assist the States, Territories, and dependencies in the construction of elementary and secondary schools. That bill is now before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. I ask unanimous consent that it be reprinted for the sole purpose of having the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] joined as cosponsor of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

APPLICATION OF RULE XIX

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish very respectfully to refer to the application of rule XIX of the Senate. The rule reads as follows:

> When a Senator desires to speak, he shall rise and address the Presiding Officer, and shall not proceed until he is recognized, and the Presiding Officer shall recognize the Senator who shall first address him. No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent, and to obtain such consent he shall first address the Presiding Officer.

The rule goes on to cover other matters not germane to the point which I wish to raise.

A few minutes ago the Presiding Officer recognized the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], who was not at the time even on the floor, although at that time the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] was seeking recognition. The junior Senator from Oregon raised the question, by way of a parliamentary inquiry, as to the propriety of the course of action of the Presiding Officer under that rule. As the RECORD tomorrow will show, as a result of the exchange between the junior Senator from Oregon and the Presiding Officer, the Senator from Oregon found himself in a position in which the senior Senator from Florida would not agree to yield for any further raising of the parliamentary inquiry.

I want to assure the Presiding Officer, because I think he knows, on the basis of his relationships with the Senator from Oregon, that the Senator from Oregon holds the Presiding Officer in very fond affection. I meant it when I said some days ago that I think the Presiding Officer is a great inspiration to the liberals of the country, and that his record has been a great record of social service. But my extremely high regard for the Presiding Officer must be considered quite independent of my duty to protect my rights and the rights of other Senators who have since this occurrence this afternoon conferred with me and expressed complete agreement with the point of view I am now expressing that rule XIX should be applied by the Presiding Officer in accordance with its clear meaning and without any understandings or arrangements entered into between the Presiding Officer and any Senator whereby he will recognize some other Senator in preference to a Senator who first addresses the Chair, is standing on the floor, and is seeking to be recognized.

This is not the first time in the history of the Senate that the Chair—not the present Presiding Officer, but another Presiding Officer—has recognized a Senator who was not even on the floor at the time. I remember quite clearly a couple of years ago an occasion when the then Presiding Officer recognized the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], because, on the basis of a list that was being kept at the desk, he was supposed to be the next Senator to be recognized, but he was not on the floor at the time, and after some little exchange a Senator who was on the floor at the time was finally recognized.

I wish to say, in all courtesy and with deep respect, that I think that we must insist that the present Presiding Officer and every other Presiding Officer of the Senate, see to it that our rights under the rules are protected, and I submit that the type of ruling the Chair handed down this afternoon may, by accretion of further misrulings, eventually reach the point where our rights are in fact seriously jeopardized. We cannot start varying the letter as to our rights under the rules of the Senate without soon finding ourselves in the position of finding that our rights are seriously interfered with.

I have been moved to comment on a recognition which occurred on the floor when I was acting as minority leader, and which I protested at the time, and I turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday, page 854, the first column on the page, starting with the language in which the RECORD says:

Mr. BRIDGES and Mr. HAYDEN rose and addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona wish to oppose the resolution?

Mr. HAYDEN. I have sought recognition to speak on the resolution itself. As chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration, I should like to discuss the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the Senator from Arizona is entitled to recognition, if the Senator wishes to discuss the resolution now. The Chair wishes to expedite the matter by getting the resolution before the Senate.

Mr. HAYDEN. As I understand, the resolution is now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No, the resolution is not before the Senate. The motion of the Senator from Illinois to proceed to the consideration of the resolution is still pending. Does the Senator from New Hampshire object?

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I have been trying to secure recognition here for several hours, and I have been taken off my feet, and a few more Senators are going to be taken off their feet, too, if I do not secure recognition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not taken the Senator off his feet. From a legislative standpoint the Senator has not been on his feet. The Chair is trying to expedite the business of the Senate. The resolution is debatable after the motion is agreed to. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Arizona if he wishes to speak on the motion.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MORSE. I do not want to be overly technical, but I certainly question whether recognition of any Senator should depend on whether he desires to address himself to the subject matter under discussion. I am sure the Presiding Officer does not mean that recognition of the Senator from Arizona is to be given on that basis. What the Presiding Officer has suggested is that he would recognize the Senator from Arizona if the Senator from Arizona proposes to speak on the resolution. I would have to raise a point of order if that is the intention of the Presiding Officer.

I think the remarks of yesterday speak for themselves, and as a Member of this body, Mr. President, I most respectfully urge that at all times rule XIX be strictly complied with at this session of the Congress.

I find myself in opposition to a practice which I have heretofore protested time and time again on the floor of the Senate, namely, of keeping a list at the presiding officer's desk, which list should be followed in recognizing Senators on the floor of the Senate. I respectfully submit that rule XIX was put into the rules to protect each and every one of the 96 of us, insofar as we are first on our feet, and asking for recognition, to be so recognized by the presiding officer, whoever he may be. I respectfully submit that this afternoon when the presiding officer announced the recognition of the Senator from West Virginia when the Senator from West Virginia was not here to be recognized, rule XIX was violated.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair feels compelled to make an observation, in view of the remarks of the Senator from Oregon. The Chair is as sincere in his belief that rule XIX should be observed by the Presiding Officer, whoever he may be, as any Senator could possibly be. As we all know, from time immemorial Senators who wanted to be recognized sometimes came to the Chair and indicated their desire for recognition. I have for many years protested the keeping of a list at the desk by private arrangement, made in the order in which Senators approached the Chair and desired to be recognized.

The Chair recognizes the full force of the rule that the Chair should recognize the first Senator who rises and asks for recognition. But when two or more Senators rise at the same time it is not always possible for the Chair to tell just which one rose first, and therefore he must exercise some discretion in determining which Senator he will recognize under the circumstances.

What has happened today is not serious. The Senator from West Virginia came to the Chair and said that he desired to reintroduce a bill, and asked me if I would recognize him. I asked him to await the conclusion of the debate on the pending appeal, and especially await the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS], and told him that if he were on his feet asking recognition then, the Chair would recognize him.

When the Senator from Vermont concluded his remarks the Chair looked over on the right to see whether the Senator from West Virginia was on his feet asking recognition, and made inquiry whether the Senator from West Virginia were in the Chamber, and was advised that he was not, whereupon the Chair recognized the Senator from Florida. So that it is not a serious infraction of the rule.

If the Senator from West Virginia had been in the Chamber and on his feet asking recognition to do what he has since done, namely, reintroduce a bill, the Chair would have recognized him. The Chair did not recognize the Senator from West Virginia in his absence from the Chamber. The Chair inquired whether the Senator from West Virginia was in the Chamber, and on being advised he was not, recognized the Senator from Florida, who was on his feet.

Calling the attention of the Chair to rule XIX has served a purpose, and the Chair thanks the Senator from Oregon. The Chair has long insisted that a Senator need not yield to any other Senator for any purpose while he has the floor, unless he is guilty of misconduct or violation of the rules himself so that he is called to order and is compelled to take his seat. A Senator is not required to yield to another Senator to make a point of order, to make the point of no quorum, or for any other purpose, and even when he yields he can yield only for a question, under the rule.

In view of the importance of legislation of all sorts, which will be controversial, that is likely to arise in the Senate at this session, the Chair hopes he will have the complete cooperation of Senators in observing and enforcing all the provisions of rule XIX, and not merely one provision.

The Chair felt he was called upon to make these remarks in view of the observations of the Senator from Oregon, in explanation of why the Chair had indicated to the Senator from West Virginia that if he were present and on his feet asking recognition to do what he did the Chair would recognize him at a certain point.

SPECIAL SMALL BUSINESS COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. WHERRY's appeal from the decision of the Chair referring Senate Resolution 55 to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is——

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. As I understand, the question before the Senate is whether the Senate will vote to sustain the Chair in his reference of the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] to the Committee on Banking and Currency. It is also my understanding that a resolution establishing a special committee on small business has been referred to the Banking and Currency Committee and is now in the hands of that committee. It is further my understanding, which I should like to have confirmed, that the Committee on Banking and Currency expects to act upon that resolution at a very early date, probably sometime next week, and to report it back to the Senate, either favorably or unfavorably, so that the matter of establishing a special Small Business Committee will be before this body within the next few days. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency if my understanding is correct.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, of course, the only question before the Senate, as the Senator from Vermont knows, is the question of the appeal from the decision of the Chair on the reference of the pending resolution. Speaking for myself, and I think the committee will agree with me, we should consider this resolution and the one previously referred to it, and they should be reported to the Senate either favorably or unfavorably. Now whether or not that will be done this week, or the next week, or whether it will be done the following week, I cannot say. All I can say is that I urge it be done as soon as possible, and I am certain that the committee will report the resolution within 2 weeks. I do not say it will be done this week, because our regular meeting day has been on Tuesdays.

Mr. AIKEN. What I wanted to get clear in my mind is whether we would very soon have a chance to discuss the establishment of a special committee for small business on the merits of the question.

Mr. MAYBANK. I can only say that the Committee on Banking and Currency will report the two resolutions, the one by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] and the other by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], if it should be referred to it, within a reasonable time, and I believe it would be certainly within 2 weeks.

Mr. AIKEN. With that understanding, Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senate could have an opportunity to act upon the matter itself as early or earlier if the Committee on Banking and Currency would report the resolution back to the Senate within a week or so, than it could if such a resolution were referred to an entirely different committee, which probably has not considered the matter at all up to this time.

Mr. MAYBANK. While I now speak only for myself, the consensus of opinion of the Committee on Banking and Currency it seemed to me was that the resolution should be reported within a reasonable time.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I wish to ask a question with reference to the latter part of the remarks just made by the Chair, with particular reference to paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 of rule XIX. As I understood the Presiding Officer's remarks, it is not in order for any Senator to interrupt another Senator while he is speaking, except for a question, and with his consent—not even for points of order. My inquiry of the Presiding Officer is: If a Senator does transgress the rules as outlined in paragraphs 2 and 3 and refuses to yield for a point of order, is there not a way that a Senator can, under those circumstances, call the other Senator to order, if the Presiding Officer does not do so?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator who has the floor makes some remark that reflects upon the integrity or the good faith—the Chair is not quoting verbatim the language of the rule—of some other Senator, he may be called to order and required to sit down, whereupon he may be permitted to proceed in order. Otherwise a Senator is not required to yield the floor for any purpose, so long as he does not violate the rules of the Senate in his own conduct, or misconduct, as the case might be.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. LUCAS obtained the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Inasmuch as the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency has now made a positive statement that within 2 weeks one of the resolutions will be reported back to the Senate, if I heard him correctly——

Mr. MAYBANK. I was speaking for myself as chairman of the committee, and I believe the other members of the committee feel the same way I do. I have no right to bind any other member of the committee.

Mr. WHERRY. I realize that, Mr. President. That is quite right. The chairman has said that he will do everything within his power to report back one of the resolutions within 2 weeks.

Mr. MAYBANK. I said I hoped to.

Mr. WHERRY. Well——

Mr. MAYBANK. Now, Mr. President, I wish no one to misunderstand me. I have only my own vote in the committee. I cannot pledge any other member of the committee. No member of the committee has given me any statement that I could use here. I represent only my own vote. But I thought it to be the consensus of opinion in the committee that within a reasonable time we would report the resolution. However, I cannot pledge any other member.

Mr. WHERRY. I will make this request then. In view of the statement made by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, in whom I have absolute confidence, I will say that I shall have accomplished the purpose I had in mind if either resolution be reported favorably by the committee. In view of the statement by the chairman of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my appeal.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I object, because I do not desire the charge to be made that I, as chairman of the committee, have been speaking for the committee. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], the ranking minority member of the committee, was not at the meeting held today.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate in referring Senate Resolution 55 to the Committee on Banking and Currency? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MORSE. Does the Senator from Nebraska have the parliamentary right to withdraw his appeal if he so desires?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and it cannot be done after that. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DONNELL. A vote "yea" is a vote to sustain the Chair. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A vote "yea" is a vote to sustain the ruling of the Chair. A vote "nay" is a vote to overrule the decision of the Chair.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] are absent on public business.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] is paired on this question with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM]. If present and voting, the Senator from New Mexico would vote "yea," and the Senator from Missouri would vote "nay."

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] is paired on this question with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY]. If present and voting, the Senator from Rhode Island would vote "yea," and the Senator from Wisconsin would vote "nay."

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] is paired on this question with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. If present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota would vote "yea," and the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "nay."

The Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] would vote "yea," if present.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] is absent on official business.

New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] would vote "nay" and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] would vote "yea."

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER] is necessarily absent and is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. If present and voting, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER] would vote "nay" and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] would vote "yea."

INFLATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the sessions of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report to consider at a public meeting the recommendations made by the President began this morning in the caucus room in the House Office Building. Problems of inflation, production, purchasing power, and employment are under consideration. The testimony which will be offered there will be of vital importance, I think, to the people of the United States.

Mr. Leon Keyserling, vice chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, testified this morning. Mr. Keyserling will be followed tomorrow by Dr. John D. Clark, also a member of the Council of Economic Advisers. Thereafter testimony will be presented by the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Charles Sawyer; the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. John W. Snyder; the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Maurice Tobin; the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Julius A. Krug; and the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Charles F. Brannan.

Mr. Raymond M. Foley, Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency; Federal Security Administrator Oscar R. Ewing; Assistant Secretary of State Willard L. Thorpe; and Chairman Thomas B. McCabe, of the Federal Reserve Board, will conclude the presentation of the testimony which has been organized by Secretary Brannan on behalf of the administration.

The Joint Committee on the Economic Report has invited a panel of nationally known economists and experts in the various problems which will be under consideration. Representatives of agricultural organizations, labor organizations, and business organizations have also been invited to attend the hearings, which will be concluded with two round table discussions, one by each of the groups which I have mentioned. These round table discussions will be conducted in public before the committee, in order to develop the best possible consensus of opinion regarding the economic situation.

In order that this information may be made available to as many readers as possible, I have had prepared a summary of the testimony which was offered this morning by the Vice Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, Mr. Leon Keyserling. I ask unanimous consent that this summary of his statement, together with a table which shows the state of employment in the United States from January 1946 to 1947, and a table on consumers' prices for the period 1939 to 1948 may be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

INFLATION AND EMPLOYMENT

TESTIMONY OF LEON H. KEYSERLING, VICE CHAIRMAN OF THE COUNCIL OF ECONOMIC ADVISERS

The Employment Act of 1946 has two basic objectives—economic stability and a continuing growth of the economy. At present the economic condition of the country is good, but there are maladjustments which if not stopped by appropriate action may produce unemployment and lower national income. While the prices of some farm products and foods have gone down in some areas, there are many strategically important parts of the economy in which prices are continuing to rise. Industrial prices have reached an all-time peak. The same contrast and imbalance between managed industrial prices and low farm prices that caused so much unemployment in the 1929–33 depression is beginning to appear again and could have similar consequences unless the danger is quickly recognized and firmly met.

There are six basic maladjustments in the current economic situation that require attention.

1. The cost of living has risen 74 percent since the middle of 1939, and 29 percent since the middle of 1946. The down-turn in the cost of living in recent weeks has thus far been only about 2 percent. At current costs clearly more than a fifth and probably a fourth of the families in the country do not have sufficient income to maintain what by scientific standards has been indicated as the minimum standard for maintenance of health and decency. People in the lowest income brackets have been hit hardest. Of those getting as little as $2,000, more than one-fourth suffered decreases in money income last year compared with 1947, and an additional 45 percent had no increases at all. On the other hand most of those already in the upper income brackets got further increases.

2. The relationship between industrial prices and farm prices has operated to the detriment of the farmer since the middle of 1946. "Since the last prewar year 1939, farm prices and incomes have risen more than most oher prices and incomes. This helped to redress the unfortunate position of the farmer in the prewar economy. But since the middle of 1946, industrial prices and incomes have been outpacing agricultural; since then, wholesale prices of farm products have risen 22 percent and of industrial commodities 45 percent * * * with per capita net income of persons on farms estimated at $909 in 1948, contrasting with $1,569 for persons not on farms, we again face the emergence of the traditional problem of maintaining agriculture in balance with the rest of the economy. The farmer's share of the consumer's dollar has dropped constantly since 1946." The cost of living can and should be reduced without driving farm income further downward. This can be accomplished by lower distributor margins, and by a comprehensive program of increased farm efficiency.

3. There are "sharp and continued increases in prices of certain vital industrial products. * * * On top of earlier price increases, during the second half of 1948 there were further increases in such significant categories of wholesale prices as fuel and lighting materials and house furnishings." Prices of metals and metal products increased 6.7 percent in the second half of 1947, 4.6 percent in the first half of 1948, 9.7 percent in the second half of 1948, and 2.2 percent during January 1949. In the second half of 1948, the price of zinc increased 44.4 percent and of lead 22.9 percent. "These continuing price increases, although selective, are at vital spots where they influence the whole economy. An unchecked upward trend of these prices, when farm prices have been falling and other prices softening, may lead to even more serious maladjustment than when almost all prices were rising together."

(4) "Consumer expenditures or demand have dropped from 76 percent of total output in 1929, and 75 percent in 1939, to only 70 percent in 1948. * * * Correspondingly compensation of employees as a share of total national income has dropped from 65.9 percent in 1939 to 61.5 percent in 1948, thus moving close to the undesirably low 58.1 percent of 1929; while business and professional income and corporate profits as a share of total national income are much higher than in 1929 and even more above the 1939 level. Readjustment in the current ratios, which cannot be sustained permanently, is essential if we are to maintain full demand for an increasing output of about 3 percent per year without a large and continuing increase in Government expenditures."

(5) "The aggregate of corporate profits has been running higher than needed to maintain current or even somewhat increased levels of business investment. Between 1947 and 1948, corporate profits after taxes increased by $2,700,000,000 and undistributed profits increased by $2,000,000,000, while there was a decline of $2,000,000,000 in corporate uses of funds." At the same time that small businesses are earning less profit in 1948 than in 1947, the larger corporations are able to finance a phenomenally high proportion of their operations from internal sources. Corporate stockholders received in dividends but 36.5 percent of net profits after taxes in 1948, contrasted with 69 percent in 1929 and 76 percent in 1939.

(6) "Some basic industries are not increasing their capacities sufficiently to attain the production levels required for the steady growth of a maximum employment economy." Instead, they are gearing their capacities to the assumption that in the future as in the past there will be a sharp drop in the business cycle. This assumption of recession or depression, in turn, increases the likelihood of the very evil against which reserves are being amassed. * * * The road to more production in the main is not higher prices and profits later on, but, instead, a rounded policy which adjusts prices and profits and capacities to a long period of stability and growth."

The easiest time to correct these maladjustments is before a crisis appears, that is now. The hardest time will be later on when neglect has actually produced the crisis. Those who are intelligent and conservative have long realized that a "stitch in time saves nine," but, unfortunately, sometimes the shiftless counsel of drift and do nothing is allowed to bring on damage that is irreparable.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1949

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Dale Crowley, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, God of all mercy and grace:

With grateful hearts, we acknowledge that Thou hast wonderfully blest our Nation. We ask that Thou wilt give to all Thy servants a sense of true thanksgiving, and with this an awareness of our stewardship before Thee. Grant that every man in this Chamber today, and every day, may think not merely of his responsibility to his constituents, but especially of his high trusteeship under God. Like Daniel Webster, exemplary statesman that he was, may our foremost thought be our accountability to God.

Give wisdom, so that we may be able to discern between the right and the wrong. Give courage, that we may ever stand for that which is true. Give humility, that we may walk before Thee acceptably; and give devotion, that we may serve Thee faithfully. We ask it in the name of our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ANDERSON of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article.

Mr. SHAFER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter from a constituent.

RENT CONTROL

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill on the controversial subject of rent control.

It is a bill that preserves the basic fundamentals of free enterprise. At the same time it prevents tenants from being gouged by the small percentage of landlords who might with justification be termed "unscrupulous and selfish." The bill provides for decontrol, but at the same time it permits any tenant who is about to be gouged the right of appeal to a local board composed of citizens in his own county. I recommend that the Members of this body study this particular measure. It will allow free collective bargaining between individual tenants and landlords with the local board acting as the final arbiter if the landlord refuses to be fair and just. We must remember that rent is merely the wage of the people who have been thrifty enough over the years to save sufficient funds to own an equity in real property. Under the present rent-control law and under the administration's proposed bill, the Government sets the rent and there is no attempt made to allow a gradual relaxation of rent control. Instead controls are to be extended for 27 months and the regulations are to be more stringent. My bill will act as a steam valve to protect the many tenants, but at the same time it will preserve the fundamentals of free enterprise.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DAGUE asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances; in the first to include an editorial from the Philadelphia Enquirer, and in the second to include a letter from Time magazine.

Mr. FARRINGTON asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution on statehood for Hawaii.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE asked and was granted permission to extend her remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a magazine article written by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. LYNCH asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, on January 5 I introduced House Joint Resolution 68, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women.

This resolution is nonpartisan. It has been a plank in the Republican national platform in 1940, 1944, and 1948.

It has been a plank in the Democratic national platform in 1944 and 1948.

It was also a plank in the Progressive Party's national platform in 1948.

For these reasons many of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle have joined me as cosponsors of the resolution and we hope that the two major parties will live up to the promises, oft repeated in their platforms.

The following Congressmen are cosponsors of this resolution: FRANK BUCHANAN, J. HARRY MCGREGOR, WILLIAM LEMKE, ERNEST K. BRAMBLETT, A. L. MILLER, THURMOND CHATHAM, EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN, HARLEY O. STAGGERS, THRUSTON B. MORTON, ROBERT F. RICH, CLARE MAGEE, ROBERT T. SECREST, TOBEY MORRIS, GORDON L. MCDONOUGH, F. EDWARD HÉBERT, CHESTER A. CHESNEY, CHARLES B. DEANE, HENDERSON LANHAM, FRANK W. NATIONAL COMMISSION ON GOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. BOGGS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced H. R. 2389, a bill providing for the establishment of a National Commission on Governmental Relations. At that time I emphasized the vital need for such a Commission and for a study such as the bill directs it to make, especially with respect to the fiscal problems existing among the various levels of government.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, I urged that other Members of the Congress, without respect to political affiliation, join with me in sponsoring this legislation. Consequently, it is with real pleasure and deep gratitude that I am able to report to the Members of this House that a bill identical with H. R. 2389 was introduced in the other body of the Congress yesterday by eight distinguished Members. S. 810 was introduced by Senator HENDRICKSON, of New Jersey, for himself and for Senator WILEY, of Wisconsin; Senator BRICKER, of Ohio; my colleague, Senator WILLIAMS, of Delaware; Senator SMITH, of New Jersey; Senator SCHOEPPEL, of Kansas; Senator IVES, of New York; and Senator O'CONOR, of Maryland.

Let me say again, Mr. Speaker, that I very much appreciate the interest of those distinguished Senators in this important matter. I also reiterate my statement of yesterday in the House, to the effect that I will welcome the introduction into the House of identical bills by any of the distinguished gentlemen in this Chamber.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the legislative business of the day and any other special orders I may address the House today for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE]?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND], I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries may sit today during the general debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PRIEST]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CELLER asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

THE TRIAL OF CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the world stands aghast at the accusation, trial, and punishment of the martyr, Cardinal Mindszenty. We are filled with horror and anger at this travesty of justice. Not only is the cardinal on trial, but all free men are being tried; all religions are on trial. The dignity of man is trampled upon. The honor of the church is defiled. Today it is a Catholic prelate that communism lays foul hands upon. Tomorrow it is a rabbi, and the next day a Protestant minister.

The lesson that burns into our consciousness is the need to purge the world of communism and its poison. The antidote is vigorous protest, followed up by appropriate economic sanctions, if necessary, by free nations, headed by the United States, if Hungary continues her dreadful and dreaded practices against the cardinal.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER]?

There was no objection.

[Mr. WALTER addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. BIEMILLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a speech on health insurance.

Mr. GREEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an article from the American magazine of December 11, 1948, on Cardinal Mindszenty.

Mr. BROOKS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

Mr. COOPER, Mr. MILLS, and Mr. REED of New York asked and were given permission to revise and extend the remarks they expect to make in the Committee of the Whole today and to include excerpts of material to which they may refer.

Mr. VAN ZANDT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a statement he made this morning before the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. BURDICK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a report from the welfare board of the county in which the Sioux Indians reside.

Mr. ANGELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan (at the request of Mr. MICHENER) was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. MITCHELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two separate instances and to include extraneous matter.

UNITED STATES SAVINGS BONDS

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, 75,000,000 people now own United States savings bonds. Plans are now being made for the spring campaign to stimulate even greater participation in bond-buying. Meanwhile the Savings Bond Division of the United States Treasury is seeking an official bond song to be sung and played on all appropriate occasions. The peace-time song will replace Irving Berlin's great war-time song, Any Bonds Today? As a member of the Society for the Preservation and Encouragement of Barber Shop Quartet Singing in America, Inc., I am proud to announce that the Treasury's quest is assured of success. The Treasury turned to the SPEBSQSA's 26,000 members, and invited them to produce the song. Entries are pouring in to International Secretary Carroll P. Adams in Detroit headquarters of the Society, and many more entries are expected before the competition closes February 15. Two thousand barber shop quartets have volunteered their services to the Treasury to sing the song at rallies scheduled in every State in the Union. Ed Place, of the Washington, D. C., chapter, whose 100-man singing capital chorus recently entertained the society's No. 1 member, President Truman, at the inaugural gala, is in charge of the savings bond song competition for SPEBSQSA. He has extended an invitation to a Congressional quartet to introduce the winning song, and I am sure that this body can supply the necessary harmonizers and harmony to assist the savings bond campaign in such a manner. The SPEBSQSA motto, Keep America Singing, will soon be augmented by Keep America Saving. It is gratifying to know that this rapidly growing public-spirited organization of male harmonizers will hold its annual midwinter meeting in the District of Columbia in January 1950. There is no finer recreation or hobby than lifting our voices in song, and it is pleasing to know that the Nation's Capital is leading the way in this great pastime.

DECISIVE FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, as we open hearings today on the European recovery program it becomes clearer than ever that our own national security and world peace are far from being a certainty. The European recovery program has saved Europe from communism, but democracy is losing China, and the United States seems impotent to even try to stop it. We must develop an immediate, vigorous, and affirmative program in Asia, and we must at the same time further fortify democracy's position in Europe and the Middle East. We are learning in Europe that a recovery program without economic and even political unity—is recovery without a point.

Mr. Speaker, our foreign policy must take the logical next step and insist that the regional groupings organized in recovery programs become regional economic and political federations—this is the true intent of the Vandenberg resolution—and the basis for an ultimate world federal government, man's hope for permanent peace.

There are appended two articles from today's Washington Post bearing on this very question:

EUROPEAN UNION

(By Sumner Welles)

SHADOW INSTEAD OF SUBSTANCE

I wonder if there is much justification for the enthusiastic reception which public opinion in the United States has given the announcement that the five Brussels pact countries have agreed upon a project for a Council of Europe.

The present plan is unquestionably a weak compromise. It rejects the French contention that a powerful European parliament should be constituted. It accepts the British thesis that nothing should now be done beyond the creation of machinery to facilitate inter-governmental cooperation between the western European countries.

So far nothing in fact has been settled except for an agreement that a constitution is to be drafted which will provide for a ministerial committee meeting in private, in which every country will have a veto power, and a consultative body meeting in public, which will be given no authority whatever. The British suggest that the council should hold its first meeting in Strasbourg before 1950 and the five Brussels pact countries have also agreed that Italy and other European countries are to be asked to join as founding members.

The project makes no provision for the limitation of national sovereignties. It possesses no real vitality. It responds to no overwhelming popular demand for a people's union. It ignores the eloquent and urgent warnings of the handful of statesmen that Europe still possesses, such as Churchill, Herriot, Reynaud, Blum, and Sforza, that Europe's only hope of salvation lies in political and economic federation.

Outside of the cooperative measures required by the European recovery program the only practical steps that have so far been taken to lay the foundation for such a federation are the economic agreements between Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxemburg, and the agreement between France and Italy for a customs union.

There are several reasons for Britain's obstinate refusal to acquiesce in the demands of the continental countries for the establishment of a European parliament possessing wide powers.

The British delegate on the permanent commission, Hugh Dalton, alleged that Britain opposed a European parliament which could overside national governments.

The continental governments have now learned that the British Labor Party is determined to reject any plan for European union which might hamper its ability to carry out its own internal policies or limit its capacity to impose economic controls and pursue its present course of rigid bilateral trading.

The British Government also differs radically with France and with Germany's other western neighbors concerning the kind of Germany we are to see in the future.

The basic British viewpoint is succinctly expressed in the Economist's recent complaint that the French "strain at the gnat of German nationalism but are willing to swallow the camel of European instability." In other words, the British feel that the French should acquiesce in the resurrection of German power as a bulwark against Soviet Russia.

It is the viewpoint of the 1920's all over again. The fact that France, after the First World War, was so tragically right in her fear of German nationalism and the English-speaking powers so tragically wrong in their insistence that there was no cause for apprehension seems to count for nothing in Downing Street.

It is also a strange anomaly that the cartels and vested interests in the continental countries that are out to sabotage any kind of European union which could deprive them of the benefits they have so long derived from customs barriers and exchange controls should now be joining hands with Britain's Socialist government in impeding, if not permanently blocking, the creation of that form of European union with Clement Attlee himself only 2 years ago officially proclaimed to be Europe's one chance for survival.

The United States until now has limited itself to a few platitudinous expressions of pleasure that plans for a European union should be under way. Yet is such a shadow of a European union as that now projected likely to be of any practical benefit to the United States or to become a regional bloc capable of strengthening the foundations of the United Nations?

It is generally admitted here in Washington that western Europe will still be a long way from recovery when the European recovery program ends in 1952. It is also believed that only a far-reaching political and economic union can make western Europe self-supporting. The negotiations for the North Atlantic defense pact have clearly shown that in many parts of western Europe there is already a trend toward regional isolation rather than toward a pooling of sovereign rights in the common interest. It would certainly seem to be plain that only a real and vital European federation, such as that envisaged by Mr. Churchill, could prevent a return to such a fractionized western Europe as that which made possible the catastrophe of 1939.

The State Department has properly refused to use the European recovery program as a means of influencing the national policies of the Marshall plan countries. But is there any valid reason why the countries which are receiving help under the European recovery program and which will obtain arms for self-defense as a result of the North Atlantic defense pact should not be frankly told that one of the principal ends sought by the American people in return for their sacrifices on behalf of western Europe is a real federation of the western European countries.

Might it not be the better part of wisdom for us to adopt before it is too late a less negative attitude with regard to this vital issue?

PARTNERS OR ALLIES

Only in the last few weeks has it dawned on the world that the United States and the Soviet Union are locked in a deadly struggle for allies in the next war. This is the lesson of the tug-of-war over Norway. The Soviet refuses to accept the Norwegian answer as the clarification that it sought of Norway's stand on the Atlantic Pact. And assuming that Moscow had any right to call for any such clarification, the answer was indeed cryptic. Norway said she would not permit the establishment of foreign bases on Norwegian soil "as long as Norway is not attacked or subjected to threats of attack." Russia rightly construes the explanation as leaving the Norwegians a free hand to determine the conditions which would persuade them to put bases in Norway at the disposal of the United States.

Moscow, however, chooses to ignore the fact that Norway is already bound solemnly under the United Nations to keep the peace. If the Soviet would be reassured by another pledge, it is doubtful whether Norway would. For a nonaggression pact in the Soviet lexicon has become the entering wedge of aggression. Cases in point are all the peace treaties that Moscow signed with the Balkan states. The fate of Czechoslovakia, in particular, makes a mockery of the Soviet request. Before the war the Soviet was the first to recognize that a nonaggression undertaking by Nazi Germany meant nothing, and first Litvinov and then Molotov insisted on spelling out all the phases of aggression, both internal and external; and then demanded guaranties. Stalin has taken a leaf out of Hitler's copybook. The plain fact, as the world no less than Norway sees it, is that as a result of Soviet postwar actions there is absent in relations with the Soviet Union the basic ingredient of what is now called a nonself-operating agreement, viz, good faith. It could thus be taken for granted that even if Norway were to sign a nonaggression pact with Soviet Russia, she would not thereby be deterred from seeking closer association with the Atlantic nations.

However, the occasion might be taken to reexamine the nature of the particular kind of Atlantic association under discussion. Why limit the association to a military alliance providing for the acquisition of bases, for arms consignments, and for a pledge to wage war together? If we feel a sense of association with western Europe, why not offer an association for peace as well as for war? Metternich said after the Napoleonic wars that "a unifying idea" was the foundation of postwar reconstruction and pacification. The "unifying idea" of his day was legitimacy of government. Today it is freedom and union—as the free peoples all recognize in their dreams, though their governments are not guided by it. Specifically, before this country sets its hand to a military alliance and embarks on a course that all history teaches will infallibly lead to war, let us issue a call for a constitutional assembly for the consideration of a grand Federal Union.

Such a call from the United States—the "music maker" for the free world—would lift the present discussions onto a new plane. It would reach peoples as well as governments, and inspire them to lift up their voices in an irresistible demonstration. In their hearts they want to relate themselves to other peoples. They know that distance has been annihilated, that what affects one affects evedybody; yet they see their governments building up vested and nationalistic interests in such things as fighting currencies, state trading systems, and other forms of anarchy. It must seem to them defeatist as well as senseless. They cannot be encouraged, either, by the spectacle that this reversion to pathological nationalism is being financed under ERP, though, to be sure, the ERP ideal is eventually to create interdependence out of a sturdier independence.

Is it not remarkable that the first thing to be forgotten in time of peace is our war aims? Cannot we see that in all the postwar schemes of pacification and reconstruction we have undershot the mark? Partnership is the effective alliance, and the only one. Before the reaction to a mere military alliance gets altogether crystallized, an effort to realize the aspirations of the men who have had to fight a couple of world wars in the last 35 years ought to be explored, and the idea of a great community taken out of the hearts of mankind and given some form and substance.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WHITTINGTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address he delivered before the thirtieth annual convention of the Mississippi Valley Association, St. Louis, Mo., on Monday, February 7, on the subject, A Sound Program of Flood Control and River and Harbor Improvements Must Be Maintained.

THE PANAMA CANAL

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, the Congress now has before it a question of national and international significance—the Panama Canal.

An important contribution to the many discussions of this subject was published in the Proceedings of the American Society of Civil Engineers, January 1949, volume 75, No. I, pages 143–145, in the form of a technical discussion by Harry Outen Cole, a consulting engineer of Morgantown, W. Va.

Mr. Cole is an engineer of great distinction who knows the Panama Canal and the problems related thereto, based upon his own personal knowledge as resident engineer of the Pacific division of the Canal, including the Pacific locks. His words will carry great weight.

I urge that every Member of the Congress and all others who are interested in the Canal question read his illuminatory discussion, which should go a long way toward clarifying the issues.

TRADE AGREEMENTS EXTENSION ACT OF 1949

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1211) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1211, with Mr. WALTER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] is recognized.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, since erroneous charges have appeared in the press that might lead some Members of the House to conclude that there was inadequate opportunity to be heard on this bill, it may be helpful to compare the background of the present bill with the procedure adopted by the Republican majority in the disposition of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948.

Last year, a subcommittee conducted the hearings on this important legislation. This year, hearings were held by the full committee.

The 1948 hearings were held behind closed doors with the press and public barred, and with a number of people deprived not only of the opportunity to be heard, but also of the right to know what other witnesses were saying before the subcommittee. In contrast, the hearings on H. R. 1211 were open to press and public and everyone who sought an opportunity to be heard was permitted to testify. Last year, although hearings were held for 6 days from May 3 to May 8, 1948, a bill was not introduced in the House until May 24. In contrast, the committee this year has had from the beginning of the hearings the benefit of knowing precisely the terms of the bill upon which the hearings were being held.

Last year the time allotted between proponents and opponents of the reciprocal-trade program was divided equally, that is, 3 days to a side. This year, the opposition had 4 days while the proponents had but 3 days. Even the terms of debate on the floor are more advantageous to the present minority than those prescribed by them when they were in control of the Eightieth Congress. Under the agreed procedure any Member will have an opportunity to offer an amendment to H. R. 1211 while last year the Republicans brought their bill to the House under a closed rule under which there was no opportunity for amendment whatever. If ever there has been a full, fair, and free hearing, discussion and deliberation of any legislation, it has been provided for the pending bill.

The bill under consideration by the House to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930 as amended, and for other purposes, will, if enacted into law, restore and unshackle the authority of the President to enter into foreign trade agreements. The Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948, Eightieth Congress, was written by the foes and not the friends of the reciprocal trade method of dealing with tariffs and international trade. It was proposed and sponsored by those who on every previous occasion had opposed and voted against the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Act beginning with 1934 and continuing to 1948.

The reciprocal trade method of dealing with tariff problems had proved so popular with the people of the country that its opponents would not risk an open effort to wipe it off the statute books, but attacked it by flank movement by the substitution of a bill which weakened, emasculated, and crippled the original act.

When the President reluctantly signed the 1948 act he protested that—

> The act prescribes a new complicated, time-consuming, and unnecessary procedure for the negotiation of reciprocal trade agreements. This change in procedure will necessarily hamper and obstruct the negotiation of new agreements, a defect which is particularly undesirable in view of the act's limitation to a single year.

However, the President, loyal to his constitutional duty, proceeded to schedule reciprocal trade negotiations with 13 foreign countries, beginning in April. In his letter to me of January 8, 1949, the President requested that the Committee on Ways and Means take up the extension of the Trade Agreements Act, without hampering amendments, at the earliest possible date. He further stated:

> The restrictive provisions and limited extension of the present trade agreements law materially hamper the effectiveness of United States participation in this effort. That is why it is so important that the existing Trade Agreements Act be promptly repealed, and that the act as it existed on March 1, 1948, be extended for a further substantial period. I suggest that this period be until June 12, 1951.

ORIGIN OF RECIPROCAL TRADE PROGRAM

In order to view the reciprocal trade program in its proper perspective, we should never forget that it was conceived by the eminent, respected and revered world statesman, Hon. Cordell Hull. Of the many magnificent contributions Mr. Hull has made to his own country and to the world community of nations, no star of his achievement shines more brightly than his reciprocal trade program. Cordell Hull, in my judgment, will be rated by future historians as one of the greatest statesmen America has ever produced. If Cordell Hull in all his long public career ever said or did an unwise thing, I never heard of it.

I distinctly remember his appearance before the Committee on Ways and Means on March 8, 1934—the same committee on which he had served so illustriously for 18 years. In his appearance on this occasion he soundly advised our committee as follows:

> Extreme obstructions to international trade inevitably result in serious economic controversies or wars, the minimum of commerce between nations, constant over-production through lack of facilities for distribution, together with every sort of artificial device to deal with the domestic price situation, vast idleness of labor, and emigration of capital into thousands of foreign industrial plants, to say nothing of the difficulties of effecting transfers of debt service due from one country to another. The alternative policy would appear to comprise a liberalization of the existing obstructions and restrictions by degrees and over a period of time through careful trade arrangements, to a more moderate and reasonable basis.

That was 15 years ago. The wisdom of his advice was appreciated and followed by the Committee on Ways and Means and the bill was approved on June 18, 1934, which was the first Trade Agreements Act.

HISTORY OF THE OPERATION OF THE TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Trade Agreements Act brought forth a basic change in our tariff philosophy. In the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930, and other high tariff measures, the ruling philosophy was that the determination of the United States tariff was solely and exclusively a matter of domestic concern. Rates were fixed at inordinately high levels to conform to the wishes of domestic producers with little or no consideration given to the importance of our export trade or the American consumer.

It will be remembered that when the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act was under consideration it was opposed by the Tariff Commission, although our friends who opposed the Hull tariff policy now seem to lay great weight on the opinion of the Tariff Commission.

It may be helpful to remember that more than one thousand eminent economists throughout the country warned those in charge of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill that, if it should be enacted into law, serious economic consequences would ensue. The Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, although heralded as a harbinger of national prosperity, was followed by the worst economic catastrophe in the history of our Government. Although it was proposed as a means of abolishing poverty and spreading prosperity throughout the land, the country experienced exactly the opposite. Under its operations industry was bankrupt, agriculture paralyzed, labor pauperized, banks failed by the thousands, and the economy of the country was shattered almost beyond belief or description, almost to the point of a revolution.

The Trade Agreements Act policy, on the other hand, recognized that tariffs are a proper subject for discussion and negotiation between and among countries interested in either import or export trade, or both.

The act, up to 1948, authorized the President to reduce excessively high tariffs up to 50 percent, not arbitrarily, but in return for concessions from foreign countries when it could be done to the mutual benefit of each. It is a repudiation of economic isolation.

Since 1934 agreements have been consummated with more than 40 foreign countries, which together with the United States account for the preponderant part of world trade. Tariffs and other barriers to trade have been progressively and selectively reduced or removed so as to facilitate the flow of profitable trade and thereby improve the standard of living and enhance the prosperity of the many countries concerned. Our many agricultural and industrial producers whose output is in excess of domestic requirements must find a profitable outlet abroad for their surpluses and in return take foreign products which are necessary either as raw materials to keep our industrial machine running or as consumer goods to supplement our own production.

How can opponents of the reciprocal trade program seriously contend that our national economy has been impaired when national income has increased from $48,600,000,000 in 1934 to $224,000,000,000 in 1948? Has business been hurt, or seriously threatened, when income from manufacturing has increased sevenfold? When agriculture, which relies heavily upon foreign markets for disposal of surplus crops, has increased its cash income from six and one-half billion dollars in 1934 to more than 31 billions in 1948?

Of course sole credit is not claimed by the friends of reciprocal trade for all these achievements, but it can be truthfully asserted that the Trade Agreements Act has played a major part in our prewar economic recovery. While no law can make us immune from the horrors of war, it is a significant fact that in World War II we did not engage in conflict with a single reciprocal trade agreement country.

Department of Commerce figures show that United States exports to trade agreement countries for the 2 years 1934–35, as compared with the 2 years 1938–39, increased 63 percent with trade agreement countries as against an increase of only 32 percent with nonagreement countries. Imports into the United States increased but 12½ percent from nonagreement countries in comparison with an increase of 27 percent from agreement countries. Our total exports for 1948 amounted to nearly $17,000,000,000 while imports totaled slightly more than $10,000,000,000. The balance in our favor in our foreign trade at present is being made up largely by grants and loans to foreign governments, but every sound thinker knows this cannot continue without national bankruptcy. Consequently, if we are to sell abroad the surpluses of our farms, mines, and factories we must take in payment goods from other countries in such quantities and on such terms as will not seriously affect or injure our domestic producers.

PROCEDURES PRIOR TO 1948 COMPARED WITH PRESENT LAW

Under the Trade Agreements Act, prior to the 1948 amendments, the following procedures were in effect:

The Interdepartmental Trade Agreements Committee, just as under existing law, served as the agency through which the President obtained advice and information before negotiating a trade agreement. The broadest interests of American agriculture, industry, and labor, and of national security were represented on the Trade Agreements Committee by a member of the Tariff Commission and by persons designated by the Secretaries of State, Treasury, War, Navy, Agriculture, Commerce, and Labor. The information and advice submitted to the Trade Agreements Committee were from three principal sources:

(a) Interested persons, including, of course, domestic producers, might either submit statements or briefs or appear in person at public hearings. I have heard of no complaint in the hearings that interested parties have been denied courteous and impartial treatment.

(b) The Tariff Commission made a study of the imports and the effect of possible concessions.

(c) The Department of Commerce made a similar study with respect to each export item considered for inclusion in a trade agreement. The Trade Agreements Committee then made its recommendations to the President, who made the final decision respecting the items included for negotiation and the extent of concessions to be offered. If any member of the Trade Agreements Committee dissented, the President was provided with a full report giving the reasons for the dissent.

The foregoing procedure provided an adequate opportunity for all interested parties to be heard before a trade agreement was negotiated. The interest of specific producers was balanced against and considered along with the over-all interest, first of the general public, then of industry, labor, agriculture, and our military, financial, and foreign policies.

The above procedures were found to operate effectively and efficiently in enabling the United States to take the initiative toward reduction and elimination of barriers to world trade. Since 1942, moreover, domestic industry has had the protection of both the careful preparation before actual negotiation of a trade agreement and also of the insertion of an "escape clause" in each agreement. Under this escape clause, concessions made with respect to any article may be modified or withdrawn if, as a result of unforeseen developments and of a concession in the trade agreement, any article on which a concession has been granted is being imported in such increased quantities and under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to any domestic industry.

I am advised by the Acting Chairman of the Tariff Commission that, as of January 31, 1949, only three applications had been filed under an escape clause. Two of the applications—one on marrons and one on whisky—have been dismissed, while the third, on spring clothespins, is still pending.

Apparently domestic industries have not considered themselves seriously injured or threatened with serious injury, else they would have invoked the escape clause procedures more frequently.

Despite the great benefits to our national economy and the maintenance of our leadership in international trade, and the safeguards to domestic producers, a hostile majority in the Eightieth Congress skillfully and deliberately set about hamstringing that program that they did not dare attempt abolish.

Despite overwhelming public sentiment to the contrary, the House passed a bill so bad that Secretary of State Marshall advised me in a letter that "our national interests would be better served to permit the Trade Agreements Act to expire than for H. R. 6556 to be enacted."

Despite modification in the other body of the deadly restrictions voted by the House, the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948, as finally enacted, and reluctantly approved by the President, imposed the following hampering limitations upon the tried and tested procedures previously in effect:

First. The Tariff Commission could no longer be represented on the Interdepartmental Trade Agreements Committee to advise and consult with the President in preparing for trade-agreement negotiations.

Second. The President was prohibited from negotiating any trade agreement until he had received a report from the Tariff Commission fixing a peril point, or minimum tariff level, on each article to be considered for possible modification of duties, or until 120 days had elapsed.

Third. On the firing line of actual negotiation with experts of foreign countries, the President was denied the participation and assistance of some of the best qualified personnel in our own Government—the members of the Tariff Commission and their staff.

Fourth. If in the over-all national interest, the President negotiated a reduction in tariff rates below the minimum recommended by the Tariff Commission—whose only concern under existing law is the interest of the specific domestic industry—then he must be subjected to the spectacle of a public justification of his actions to the Congress.

The bill under consideration would remove the restrictions of the 1948 act and would clear the path for the negotiations with 13 countries scheduled to begin in April, and would eliminate the doubt created by the Eightieth Congress whether the United States has definitely and permanently turned away from economic and political isolationism.

ENACTMENT OF H. R. 1211 ESSENTIAL TO OUR FOREIGN POLICY AND NATIONAL SECURITY

Every interested representative of the executive branch of the Government—the President, the Secretary of State, Secretary of Defense, Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of Agriculture, Secretary of Commerce, Secretary of Labor and Economic Cooperation Administrator—have advised that the revival and extension of the reciprocal trade program for another period of 3 years from June 12, 1948, without the crippling amendments contained in the present law, is essential to the success of our foreign economic policy.

Assistant Secretary of State Thorp testified:

> The trade agreements program is an integral part of our over-all program for the world economic recovery.
> * * * Viewed in that perspective, it is perfectly clear to me that the trade agreements program must continue in the form which will render it most effective; namely, the form introduced in H. R. 1211, the form which has stood the test of experience for 14 years.

Secretary of the Treasury Snyder wrote on January 24, 1949:

> Far-reaching developments in world economic relationships require that we plan for a changed basis for international economic stability, if our friendly partners in the world community are generally to achieve economic self-sufficiency. The careful and selective study and progressive elimination of trade barriers must go hand in hand with the programs of financial assistance we are administering. For this reason, I consider the reciprocal trade agreements program to play a vital role in supporting our foreign financial policies.

Secretary of Agriculture Brannan reported the direct interest of the American farmer as follows:

> The farmers of this country normally produce many commodities in greater quantities than are required for use in the United States. Any acceptable United States farm program, therefore, must be associated with a program for keeping open the channels of international trade in a manner that will permit United States agricultural products to compete abroad. The American farmer must not have his products excluded from foreign markets by excessive tariffs and other barriers or discriminated against through preferences and other special deals between foreign governments.

Secretary of Commerce Sawyer observed in a letter dated January 25, 1949, with regard to American producers and consumers that—

The tariff adjustments which have resulted have benefited our consumers at a time when supplies were short. The concessions received from other countries have also been of significance to some of our exporters.

Secretary of Labor Tobin wrote on January 28, 1949:

I need not dwell at length on the interest of American workers and their families in the continuation of the trade-agreements program. High levels of world trade mean high standards of living at home, making available to labor those materials and products that can be produced most efficiently abroad, and making available to workers abroad, both for consumption and for economic development, what we produce in the United States.

Economic Cooperation Administrator Hoffman warned:

ECA's interest in reciprocal trade agreements legislation stems from the basic objectives for the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948 which are to furnish materials and financial assistance to the participating countries in such a manner as to aid them, through their own individual and concerted efforts, to become independent of extraordinary outside economic assistance within the period of operations under this title * * *.

An increase in the world volume of trade is not only desirable but vitally necessary if the other countries are to recover their ability to pay their own way.

Opposition witnesses and members of the minority have recklessly asserted that the reciprocal trade program has jeopardized our national security by threatening, or injuring, domestic industries essential to the defense of our country.

It is argued, at page 6 of the minority report, that the peril-point report of the Tariff Commission should be continued so that the findings of the Commission as to the point below which tariff reduction might endanger our vital industries will be known to the President.

Of course, there is nothing whatever in the 1948 act that requires the Tariff Commission to consider anything more than the private interests of domestic producers. There is not a single word in the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948 that requires the Tariff Commission to consider the national defense in fixing its peril point. If this factor is so important why was it not written into the 1948 act?

In a deliberate effort to becloud the issue by attributing to the trade-agreements program perennial financial embarrassment of one manufacturer of jeweled watches, the minority report reprints a letter addressed to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] by Lt. Gen. LeR. Lutes, Director of the Staff of the Munitions Board.

This letter states, in brief, that the maintenance of at least a minimum level of operation by the American jewel-watch industry is vital to the defense of the United States.

In order to clarify the record finally and permanently, insofar as the watch industry is concerned, I wrote Secretary of Defense Forrestal, the member of the President's Cabinet whose uppermost consideration at all times is the maintenance of our national security, as follows:

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In the recent hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means on the extension of the Trade Agreements Act there has been some conflicting testimony whether the reciprocal trade authority has been administered in such a way as to impair the important role of the domestic watch industry in our program of national defense.

Will you please give me your opinion on this question? Inasmuch as the bill H. R. 1211, to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and for other purposes, is scheduled for debate in the House early next week, your expeditious consideration of this inquiry will be appreciated.

On February 4, 1949, Secretary Forrestal replied as follows:

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Reference is made to your letter of February 3, 1949, requesting my views on the question of whether the reciprocal trade authority has been administered in such a way as to impair the important role of the domestic watch industry in our program of national defense.

The domestic jewel watch industry has fulfilled its role in our program of national defense, and I am not aware that its capabilities have been adversely affected by the reciprocal trade authority.

It is true, as General Lutes pointed out in his letter of February 1, 1949, to Representative THOMAS E. MARTIN, a copy of which I sent you the other day, that the maintenance of at least a minimum level of operation by the American jewel-watch industry is vital to the defense of the United States and should be preserved. I believe, however, that the trade agreements program is so designed as to permit adequate protection in this regard. For example: The program offers an excellent means of protecting those industries considered vital to the national security by the retention of tariffs. The National Military Establishment member on the inter-departmental committee which administers the law has frequently made representations of this nature in the interest of national defense.

As I stated to you in my letter of January 28, 1949, the National Military Establishment believes that the Trade Agreements Act should be renewed. It is considered that such a step is in the interest of national security both in the immediate and in the long-term sense.

Now, perhaps the opponents of the reciprocal trade program will stop using the cry of national defense behind which to cloak their hereditary high-tariff protectionism.

OVERWHELMING SUPPORT OF H. R. 1211 BY REPRESENTATIVES OF AMERICAN AGRICULTURE, CONSUMERS, INDUSTRY, AND LABOR

The overwhelming desire of the vast majority of the American people in private life is also to restore unimpaired the original Hull reciprocal trade program. The people understand and concur in such statements made to the Committee on Ways and Means as the following:

First. Mr. Russell Smith representing the National Farmers Union:

Our farmers still believe that the senseless race of self-sufficiency among nations which the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act chiefly incited was among the principal causes of World War II. They still believe that a prosperous world cannot be achieved without free exchange of commodities. They still believe that dilution of the Trade Agreements Act will be construed by the world at large as proof that American deeds do not accord with American professions.

Second. The American Farm Bureau Federation, with a membership of 1,325,000 farm families in 45 States strongly favors the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act without crippling amendments, as testified before our committee by Mr. Allan B. Kline, president. Among other things Mr. Kline said:

No group in the United States has a greater stake in maintaining a high level of exports than American farmers. The American farmer needs foreign markets. In 1948 the production of agricultural products was 38 percent above the prewar level. In the case of some products the increase in production was much greater.

* * * That is why they are so vitally interested in the success of the reciprocal trade agreements program, which seeks to remove the barriers to trade so that trade can expand.

We, therefore, support the continuation of the Trade Agreements Act for another 3-year period and the elimination of the restrictions enacted in the 1948 Extension Act which tend to hamper the successful operation of this program.

Third. Mrs. C. D. Wright, chairman, legislative department, General Federation of Women's Clubs:

The general federation strongly endorses the legislation now under consideration by the House Ways and Means Committee providing for a restoration of the 1934 act and a return to the 3-year cycle which has operated with such success in the past.

Fourth. Mrs. Margaret F. Stone, chairman of legislation, National Women's Trade Union League, who also appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means for the American Home Economics Association and the National Council of Jewish Women:

The women of this country, in large numbers, are for the trade-agreements program and want to see it made permanent, without shackles. They are for it as housewives interested in the family budget and making the dollar go as far as possible. They are for it as workers, whether in industry, in offices, or in other occupations. They are for it, above all, as humanitarians who want to see every pillar in the foundation of world peace made as strong as possible.

Fifth. Mr. Charles P. Taft, speaking for the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America:

On March 25, 1947, the executive committee of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, on recommendation of the commission on the basis of a just and durable peace, reaffirmed its endorsement of the reciprocal-trade-agreements program and deplored any course by Members of the Congress which might cast any doubt upon the continued adherence of the United States to the fundamentals of this program.

The development of the European recovery program lends added importance to the increase of multilateral exchange of goods and services. As the Federal Council of Churches executive committee said in this connection on January 13, 1948:

"If the United States is to fulfill its long-term responsibility in the world economy it must help enable other countries to manufacture and sell their own goods and services in order to buy what they need.

"Therefore, the European recovery program should be linked with long-range planning to increase American imports so that European economic life as well as our own may be maintained at a high level."

Sixth. Mr. Walter J. Mason, national legislative representative, American Federation of Labor:

The chief instrument by which this Nation can contribute toward a progressive reduction in world trade barriers is the reciprocal-trade-agreements program. * * * Because of our stake, as workers in a free society, in developing a peaceful and prosperous world, we firmly support a 3-year extension of this program.

Seventh. Mr. Stanley H. Ruttenberg, director of education and research, Congress of Industrial Organizations:

It has been alleged that the trade-agreements program, by reducing American tariffs, will reduce American wage levels to the wage levels of foreign countries. * * *

High productivity, rather than the American tariff, accounts for the American wage level. If our labor productivity were low, we would not have high wages even if our tariffs were raised a thousand times. Many foreign countries have much higher tariffs than the United States, yet their wage levels are lower than ours. The plain truth is that foreign countries worry about their ability to compete with us.

* * * * *

The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act is an important cog in our complex domestic economy. But the importance of the act does not stop there. Reciprocal trade agreements play an equally important part in enabling us to carry out our tremendous world responsibilities and commitments under the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948 to reduce trade barriers.

CONCLUSION

It is my considered judgment that international trade conducted on an equitable, live-and-let-live, just-and-fair, Golden Rule basis will do much to promote prosperity and international good will among the nations of the world. In my opinion, peace, freedom, and world trade go hand in hand.

I do not question the motives nor the sincerity of those who differ with me on this very important legislation. What I do question is the logic of their reasoning and the soundness of their conclusions.

I will make my position plain on the subject of the tariff. I am not a free-trader in the generally accepted meaning of the term and would oppose any lowering of the tariff that would inflict serious injury upon any legitimate, efficiently managed domestic industries. On the other hand, I am not an apostle of a high, panic-producing, monopoly-sheltering, trade-throttling, enemy-making tariff. Truth never abides in extremes—a safe, middle-of-the-road course, free of extremes, is the highway we should travel in tariffs, as well as in all public matters. This bill keeps us well within that course, and I trust and expect the House will give it an overwhelming approval.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 8, 1949.

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In my message on the state of the Union I asked the Congress to act promptly to extend the Trade Agreements Act without the hampering restrictions placed on it by the last Congress.

As you know, negotiations will begin in April to extend the benefits of the general agreement on tariffs and trade to 13 countries that did not participate in the original agreement. This general agreement, concluded in the autumn of 1947, is the most important and comprehensive trade agreement in history. Under it the United States and 22 other nations agreed to reduce their tariffs, or to maintain low tariffs, or none at all, on a wide variety of products. The products affected accounted in 1938 for over half of the world's international trade. In addition, the participating countries agreed to curb the use of other trade restrictions, such as import quotas, and to limit various kinds of discrimination, such as preferential treatment of imports from one country as against those from another. Never before have so many nations combined in such an intensive effort to reduce barriers to trade.

The extension of the benefits of this agreement under the authority of the Trade Agreements Act is a practical cooperative effort to remove unnecessary obstacles to the building of a stable and prosperous world. The restrictive provisions and limited extension of the present trade-agreements law materially hamper the effectiveness of United States participation in this effort. That is why it is so important that the existing Trade Agreements Act be promptly repealed, and that the act as it existed on March 1, 1948, be extended for a further substantial period. I suggest that this period be until June 12, 1951.

Unless nations can sell each other the products of their agriculture, labor, and industry to the greatest possible extent, there can be no sure foundation for economic peace. Unless world trade is increased, the tremendous investment we are making toward world economic recovery will be largely wasted. Unless trade restrictions are relaxed, the lot of the private trader in international trade will become increasingly difficult.

In the achievement of these objectives, United States leadership and United States action is a decisive influence.

The trade-agreements program has proved itself to the people of the United States. It has justly earned their overwhelming support. We must be in a position to press that program forward with vigor.

I know that I can count on your continued support in securing necessary action to this end at the earliest possible date.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

I have today signed H. R. 6556, the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948. Unfortunately, this act extends for only 1 year the authority to enter into reciprocal trade agreements. It also makes unwise changes in the procedure for negotiating such agreements.

I regret very much that the Congress has not seen fit to renew this authority for the customary 3-year period. There is no valid reason for a 1-year limitation, which appears to cast some doubt upon our intentions for the future.

Moreover, the act prescribes a new, complicated, time-consuming, and unnecessary procedure for the negotiation of reciprocal trade agreements. This change in procedure will necessarily hamper and obstruct the negotiation of new agreements, a defect which is particularly undesirable in view of the act's limitation to a single year.

The reciprocal-trade-agreements program has long occupied a key position in our foreign policy and in our endeavors to assist world recovery. As I pointed out in a special message to the Congress last March, the program is a tested and practical means for achieving the benefits of expanding world commerce for the United States and other countries and a continuing evidence of the determination of the United States to contribute its full share to the reconstruction of a sound and growing world economy as a basis for enduring world peace.

As part of the European recovery program, the participating countries have agreed to work together to lower barriers to trade. The United States can surely do no less than show its determination to support the same principle, which is so important to an expansion of world markets and world trade.

It is so essential that the reciprocal-trade-agreements program should not lapse that I have signed this act in spite of its serious defects.

I will do my best to make the new procedures work. As a first step, I intend to proceed in the near future with plans for bringing other countries into the general agreement on tariffs and trade signed with 22 countries at Geneva in October 1947.

The reciprocal-trade-agreements program is one of high national policy. When the act is again extended next year, I trust that the defects contained in this year's extension will be corrected, in order that the act will be restored as a fully effective instrument of permanent United States policy.

JUNE 26, 1948.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, January 24, 1949.

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: On March 1, 1948, the President addressed a message to the Congress recommending that the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, then due to expire on June 12, 1948, be extended for a period of 3 years from that date without change. Despite this recommendation, the Eightieth Congress enacted the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948, extending the authority for entering into reciprocal trade agreements only for a period of slightly more than 1 year, and prescribing new procedures which in fact constituted obstacles to the negotiation of such agreements. The interested agencies of the executive branch of the Government advised strongly against these changes. The President reluctantly approved the bill, since the only alternative was to permit the program to lapse.

On June 2, 1948, while the Senate had under consideration H. R. 6556, Eightieth Congress, which later became, with amendments, the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948, I set forth the views of the Treasury Department on the bill in a letter to the then chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate. At that time I wrote:

"The bill purports to extend the reciprocal-trade-agreements authority in the Executive for an additional period of approximately 1 year; but, in the judgment of this Department, its provisions are such as to disrupt the present smoothly operating interdepartmental machinery and to render the reciprocal-trade-agreements program unworkable."

A detailed report on the difficulties encountered in administering the program in accordance with the procedural requirements set forth in the 1948 act is being put before you by the Department of State. The Treasury Department, which shares responsibility for the administration of the program, has been furnished with an advance copy of the statement which is to be placed before your committee today by the State Department, and is in full agreement with it.

However, there is one aspect of the question which I particularly wish to bring to the attention of your committee. Under the provisions of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, I serve as Chairman of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems, the interdepartmental body which has responsibility for coordinating the policies and operations of this Government in the foreign financial, exchange, and monetary field. Currently, the Council is giving its primary attention to a series of far-reaching programs involving financial assistance for other countries of the world. In carrying out these functions, the Council has constantly borne in mind the policies enunciated by the Congress in this connection, calling for the progressive reduction of trade barriers, the elimination of unfair trade practices, the expansion and balanced growth of international trade, and the establishment of stable international economic relationships (Bretton Woods Agreements Act, sec. 14; Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, sec. 102 (a)).

The achievement of these aims and the restoration of a healthy international economy cannot be accomplished merely by looking backward toward a restoration of prewar conditions. Far-reaching developments in world economic relationships require that we plan for a changed basis for international economic stability, if our friendly partners in the world community are generally to achieve economic self-sufficiency. The careful and selective study and progressive elimination of trade barriers must go hand in hand with the programs of financial assistance we are administering. For this reason, I consider the reciprocal-trade-agreements program to play a vital role in supporting our foreign financial policies.

The President, on January 8, 1949, repeated the recommendation he made on March 1, 1948, that the reciprocal-trade-agreements program should be extended for 3 years from June 12, 1948, without the limitations on the Presidential authority contained in the 1948 legislation. A bill has now been introduced (H. R. 1211) to accomplish this purpose. I strongly urge that your committee give favorable consideration to that bill.

This Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this report to your committee.

Very truly yours,

JOHN W. SNYDER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington 25, D. C., January 24, 1949.

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. DOUGHTON: I am writing in connection with the hearings being held by your committee on H. R. 1211, a bill to extend the authority of the President (to negotiate foreign-trade agreements) under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended. This Department favors the passage of H. R. 1211.

On May 6, 1948, I appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means to advocate the extension of authority provided in the bill under reference. The Trade Agreements Act granting that authority had been in effect without significant alteration for 14 years. I stated the basic interest of agriculture in the reciprocal-trade-agreements program. That program is the necessary foreign counterpart of a long-term domestic agricultural program.

The farmers of this country normally produce many commodities in greater quantities than are required for use in the United States. Any acceptable United States farm program, therefore, must be associated with a program for keeping open the channels of international trade in a manner that will permit United States agricultural products to compete abroad. The American farmer must not have his products excluded from foreign markets by excessive tariffs and other barriers or discriminated against through preferences and other special deals between foreign governments.

Agriculture is interested in the trade-agreements program not only in connection with agricultural exports but also in connection with industrial exports. Agriculture needs a wide and dependable market in the United States for American farm products. Sales abroad of products of the American factory result in greater employment and consequently greater domestic demand for products of the American farm. This is particularly true of products which are consumed increasingly as incomes rise, such as dairy and poultry products, meats, fruits, nuts, and vegetables. But a high level of American industrial exports can be maintained only in a climate of world prosperity, a climate which can prevail only when there is extensive interchange of goods and services between countries. The trade-agreements program is designed to facilitate such an interchange.

In order that foreign countries may pay for our farm and factory products, they must obtain dollars. For the time being, of course, conditions resulting from the war have made it necessary to supply many of our exports as gifts or on credit. However, this cannot be continued indefinitely. The most important continuing source of dollars for our foreign customers is their sale of goods to us; that is, our imports. Under the reciprocal-trade-agreements program, we have developed a mechanism whereby we can reduce the barriers against imports into the United States in such a way as to increase those imports without causing injury to established United States industry.

The imports thus obtained tend to raise our living standards. The large block of our population represented by farm people is an important group of consumers. They know that the benefits of trade do not lie merely in getting rid of a maximum amount of goods. They want to get as much as possible in return. The trade-agreements program is designed to facilitate that.

As a long-term program, the trade-agreements program can be of aid in the immediate problem of European recovery. Under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948, the United States has launched on a program of direct aid so that the other participating countries may carry their recovery to the point where they are enabled to join us as partners in a going international economy. The reduction of trade barriers now can help assure progress toward such an economy.

Despite the difficult circumstances of international relations which prevailed between the original adoption of the Trade Agreements Act in 1934 and the beginning of the war, experience under the program in that period showed a consistent advantage to the American farmer. Our farm exports to countries with which we had trade agreements increased more than exports to other countries. Moreover, the exports of items on which tariff reductions had been obtained increased more than exports of other products. There was also an increase in imports. The agricultural commodities involved in the increase in imports were those needed either because they are not produced in the United States or are not produced here in sufficient quantity for United States needs. The importation of items directly in competition with American agricultural products increased relatively little.

On the basis of experience under the program, there has been worked out a method of dealing with cases of unforeseen injury or threat of injury to domestic industry. This is the escape clause, which enables us in any case where producers sustain or are threatened with injury due to operation of the agreement to suspend or withdraw the concession made. This clause will be included in all reciprocal trade agreements to which the United States become a party.

The previous Congress changed the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act in a way that makes it more difficult to operate. These changes do not improve the procedures under the act either from the point of view of accomplishing its objectives or of preventing injury to United States producers. I should like to support H. R. 1211, which would restore the legislation substantially to its previous form.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES F. BRANNAN,
Secretary.

THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE,
Washington, January 25, 1949.

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DOUGHTON: I understand that your committee has begun public hearings on H. R. 1211, the reciprocal-trade-agreements legislation. Although I do not care to appear before the committee to speak on the bill, I do wish to have the views of the Department of Commerce included in the record of the hearings.

The history of this legislation is well known to your committee and the policies it represents need not be elaborated. There is no doubt but what the disturbed conditions of world trade arising from World War II and the conditions which have existed since then have not been peculiarly favorable toward securing the fullest benefits from these policies. However, it does seem clear that the tariff adjustments which have resulted have benefited our consumers at a time when supplies were short. The concessions received from other countries have also been of significance to some of our exporters.

I should like to urge that the authority to conclude trade agreements under this legislation be extended for at least 3 years from June 30, 1948. I also endorse the proposal that this extension be in substantially the same form as the act prior to the 1-year renewal last spring. The former act was tested in practice and enabled the administration to carry out effectively the intent of the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES SAWYER,
Secretary of Commerce.

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, January 28, 1949.

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I would like to offer a statement of the position of the National Military Establishment in connection with the hearings which your committee is presently conducting on the extension of the Trade Agreements Act.

The Military Establishment considers that the Trade Agreements Act should be renewed. It is considered that such a step is in the interest of national security both in the immediate and in the long-term sense.

The stated position is the position of the Munitions Board. For greater detail, I attach a staff analysis by the staff of the Munitions Board, prepared at my request, which considers the various interests of the Military Establishment in the extension of this legislation.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES FORRESTAL.

STATEMENT PREPARED BY THE STAFF OF THE MUNITIONS BOARD

NATIONAL SECURITY AND THE TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The extension of the Trade Agreements Act in 1945 provided that the War and Navy Departments should be represented on the Trade Agreements Committee. The extension in 1948 substituted representation by the National Military Establishment. Experience since 1945 has proved that this representation has proved valuable by providing a direct expression of opinion on national security in trade-agreement negotiations. It has also emphasized the importance of the trade-agreement program to national security.

1. The trade-agreements program helps the United States meet its problems in strategic commodities: The National Military Establishment has an obvious and well-recognized interest in strategic commodities. Some of these commodities are produced in adequate quantities in the United States but for others we are dependent in whole or in part upon supplies from foreign countries. For those which are produced in the United States it is sometimes necessary to balance the desire for a large-scale current production to maintain a strong domestic industry with the conflicting desire for adequate emergency reserves. World War II seriously diminished our reserves at the same time that it made clear that the demands of war upon strategic commodities have greatly increased and that the problems of overseas transportation may be serious. As a result the Congress provided for stock piling and later that the expenditures for Economic Cooperation Administration be used in part to aid the stock piles.

Negotiations under the Trade Agreements Act can and have been used to reduce United States tariffs on strategic commodities where it was desirable to increase supplies from foreign sources and in a few cases to reduce or eliminate the export duties or restrictions of other supplying countries. It is desirable that the authority to take similar action in the future be preserved.

2. The trade-agreement program helps keep our national economy strong: The United States is fortunate enough to possess a large domestic market which allows many commodities to be produced efficiently on a large scale. These strong domestic industries frequently produce commodities which other countries like to buy if they have the dollar exchange to do it, since they can purchase them from us more economically than they can produce on a small scale for their own more limited market. Often they can in turn sell us other commodities which they can produce efficiently because they possess the natural resources or the type of labor required. Even at present, and to a greater extent when the emergency programs of assistance come to an end, our ability to export will be limited by the ability of others to sell to us.

Our national security planning is largely based on our industrial capacity. Its size and its ability to be mobilized quickly and effectively for the production of supplies and equipment needed by the armed forces form one of our greatest bulwarks. Our machine-tool industry, our automobile industry, and our radio industry are all cases in point. They are also examples of industries which are in part dependent upon exports and which have benefited from the trade-agreements program in the past.

The trade-agreements program is so designed as to permit flexibility in operation. It can be used to encourage exports and imports and can also be used to limit the amount of goods received from foreign countries. For example, the program offers an excellent means of protecting those industries considered vital to the national security by the retention of tariffs. The National Military Establishment member on the interdepartmental committee which administers the law has frequently made representations of this nature in the interest of national defense. Natural rubber has long entered the United States free of duty, but in trade agreements this country has retained the right to restrict imports of natural-rubber products in order to protect synthetic-rubber production. Through the efforts of the Military Establishment provisions of this nature with respect to rubber have been included in the ITO charter as well as the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

3. The trade-agreement program is an aid to friendly countries: The United States is today a strong proponent of multilateral world trade on a nondiscriminatory basis. Many countries which formerly favored such a policy are lukewarm toward it at present because of their postwar difficulties in trade and exchange. Our trade-agreement program buttresses our policy position, strengthens the economies of countries friendly to us and offers them an avenue of escape from the maze of international discriminations into which the world economy might so easily deteriorate.

The United States, by implementing the Marshall plan, has proved itself willing at considerable cost to aid the economies of friendly countries. But this is a temporary expedient looking toward their getting firmly upon their own feet again. That result will depend in no small part upon their access to our market, which is aided by the trade-agreement program. A healthy world economy is of interest to the United States for national security as well as for other reasons.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 28, 1949.

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman, Ways and Means Committee,
House of Representatives,
Washington 25, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN DOUGHTON: As one of the departments which have been directly involved in the administration of the Trade Agreements Act, the Department of Labor would like to place its views before your committee in connection with consideration of the act's extension.

I need not dwell at length on the interest of American workers and their families in the continuation of the trade-agreements program. High levels of world trade mean high standards of living at home, making available to labor those materials and products that can be produced most efficiently abroad, and making available to workers abroad, both for consumption and for economic development, what we produce in the United States. If we are to participate in the development of productivity and living standards abroad in the manner outlined by the President in his inaugural message, we must surely visualize a continually expanding stream of multilateral trade.

In the opinion of the Department of Labor, an immediate extension of the Trade Agreements Act is desirable to facilitate the negotiations for which the administration is now preparing, and thereby broaden the coverage of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. The present duration of the act is too brief to assure reasonably adequate accomplishment within its term.

It is also the Department's opinion that the 1948 amendments to the act which established the "peril point" mechanism should be removed, and that the method for the negotiation of agreements should revert to the procedure of fully cooperating interdepartmental machinery previously in use under the statute. The Department of Labor believes that, insofar as tariffs are concerned, the well-being of workers and their families in the United States can be adequately protected through such machinery.

I should also like to call your attention to one other respect in which the language of the act might be improved. It is now provided that the President shall seek information and advice, in connection with the negotiation of a trade agreement, from several Government agencies specifically named, and from "such other sources as he may deem appropriate." The Department of Labor has been added by Executive order to the group of agencies specifically mentioned by name. Since 1947 the Department of Labor has been represented on the Interdepartmental Committee on Trade Agreements, and since 1948 on the Committee for Reciprocity Information. The inclusion of the Department of Labor among the agencies specifically mentioned in the statute would make clearer to the general public the broad base upon which the trade-agreements program is administered.

It has been impossible to effect clearance of this letter with the Bureau of the Budget prior to its transmittal to you.

Yours very truly,

MAURICE J. TOBIN,
Secretary of Labor.

ECONOMIC COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION,
Washington 25, D. C., January 27, 1949.

The Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman, Ways and Means Committee, New House Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DOUGHTON: Enclosed please find a statement of ECA's views on the trade-agreements legislation now before Congress.

Sincerely,

PAUL G. HOFFMAN, Administrator.

ECA'S POSITION IN REGARD TO THE FORTHCOMING RECIPROCAL-TRADE-AGREEMENTS LEGISLATION

ECA strongly supports the trade-agreements legislation now before Congress. In line with the over-all objectives of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948, ECA is especially concerned with accelerating the export of goods from European countries to all foreign markets, including the United States, as a means of enabling these countries to balance their international payments and so reduce the assistance they require from the United States. We support the legislation now pending before Congress in that it aids in this effort.

ECA's interest in reciprocal-trade-agreements legislation stems from the basic objectives of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948 which are to furnish materials and financial assistance to the participating countries "in such a manner as to aid them, through their own individual and concerted efforts, to become independent of extraordinary outside economic assistance within the period of operations under this title, * * *."

An increase in the world volume of trade is not only desirable but vitally necessary if the other countries are to recover their ability to pay their own way. The reciprocal-trade-agreements legislation now pending before Congress is a basic means to the expansion of world trade, for this legislation will give the President authority to adjust tariff rates and enter into tariff agreements (subject to definite limitations and procedures) for an extended period of time, thus affording continuity of action.

Six countries now receiving ECA assistance are already parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade, a comprehensive tariff agreement entered into by the United States under the authority of the Trade Agreements

Act. Four additional countries which now receive ECA assistance will participate in tariff negotiations this coming April, looking toward accession to the agreement. The potential for recovery inherent in these negotiations depends upon favorable action by Congress in establishing the proposed trade-agreements legislation now pending before Congress.

EDITORIAL

IN THE NATIONAL INTEREST

The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act should be restored to normal health as soon as possible. Indeed, in the interest both of a sound national economy and of international peace the State Department should be encouraged to engage in even more vigorous efforts to reduce trade barriers.

This newspaper has steadily supported the Hull policy of carefully exploring specific measures for broadening mutually beneficial trade. The method of permitting the State Department to investigate, hear objections from domestic producers, and negotiate reciprocal agreements has seemed to us vastly superior to the politics-ridden, logrolling, tariff-making Congress has too often indulged in. The old system generally resulted in higher and higher barriers because favors were granted to one local interest after another as against the welfare of the Nation as a whole.

One of the greatest advances under the reciprocal policy was made in 1947 when the United States signed an agreement with 22 other nations covering tariff rates on 45,000 items. Then last summer Congress reversed the whole trend. It extended an emasculated act for only 1 year—to await further attention when the Republicans had taken over both White House and Capitol and had reconciled their differences. The last three Republican Presidential candidates had supported the reciprocity idea—which had good Republican antecedents. But a majority of Republicans in Congress had clung to protection.

We opposed the bill passed by the Eightieth Congress. It reflected the division and confusion within the Republican Party and could be regarded only as a most unsatisfactory expedient. Its very temporariness made planning and negotiating most uncertain. And in the main it expressed the old protectionist doctrine. It harked back to the idea that foreign goods should not be allowed to enter the country if they undersold a domestic producer—no matter whether they benefited American consumers or enabled foreign consumers to buy goods other American producers had to export. It appeared to give no weight to over-all national interest or to trade's effects on international peace.

Congress never had any popular mandate for this backward step. It would be well now to return promptly and firmly to the policy of promoting trade. We welcome President Truman's request to Congress to renew the Trade Agreements Act for 3 years. We trust the House Ways and Means Committee will not be thrown off by the efforts of a few Republican die-hards to cast suspicion on the State Department and to link the Hull policy with communism. We hope the extreme nature of its unworthy effort only reflects weakness in the protectionist position.

For the necessity of lowering trade barriers has become increasingly clear as America's new creditor position has become clear. The interests of farmers and of much of the business community are now directly lined up behind efforts to find foreign markets for American goods. An intelligent tariff policy is required to supplement the Marshall plan in easing the dollar famine abroad. It is equally essential to undergird with economic cooperation the political and potential military cooperation outlined in the Atlantic security pact.

[From the Mobile (Ala.) Register of January 31, 1949]

INDEED PUBLIC SENTIMENT APPROVES HULL-TYPE RECIPROCAL-TRADE POLICY

House Ways and Means Committee hearings are scheduled to be resumed Monday on legislation to free the reciprocal-trade-agreements program of the shackles placed on it by the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress.

Meanwhile Representative ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, North Carolina Democrat, gave pointed answer at week end to charges by Representative DANIEL A. REED, New York Republican, that the Democratic majority on the committee has engaged in "steamroller tactics."

Mr. DOUGHTON is chairman of the committee, and Mr. REED is the top-ranking Republican member.

According to International News Service, Chairman DOUGHTON said with respect to his Republican colleague's criticism:

"These baseless attacks appear to be an attempt to camouflage the historic and consistent Republican hostility to the reciprocal-trade program, which is now thoroughly understood and overwhelmingly accepted and approved by the American people.

"In contrast with the procedure of the Committee on Ways and Means in the Eightieth Congress, when a subcommittee allotted 1 week for hearings behind closed doors, all interested persons have been granted the opportunity to be heard in open session, with the public and press present. * * *

"There is absolutely no foundation for the charge that unfair tactics are being used in our committee."

Congressman DOUGHTON can find confirmation in every direction for his statement that reciprocal-trade policy has overwhelming approval of the people. Republicans in the Eightieth Congress who had a hand in hamstringing the trade program cannot justifiably feel proud of their performance.

Urging prompt removal of the handicaps fashioned by the preceding Congress, the Christian Science Monitor says:

"The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act should be restored to normal health as soon as possible. Indeed, in the interest both of sound national economy and of international peace, the State Department should be encouraged to engage in even more vigorous efforts to reduce trade barriers.

"This newspaper has steadily supported the Hull policy of carefully exploring specific measures for broadening mutually beneficial trade. The method of permitting the State Department to investigate, hear objections from domestic producers, and negotiate reciprocal agreements has seemed to us vastly superior to the politics-ridden, logrolling tariff-making Congress has too often indulged in. The old system generally resulted in higher and higher barriers because favors were granted to one local interest after another as against the welfare of the Nation as a whole.

"One of the greatest advances under the reciprocal policy was made in 1947 when the United States signed an agreement with 22 other nations covering tariff rates on 45,000 items. Then last summer Congress reversed the whole trend. It extended an emasculated act for only 1 year—to await further attention when the Republicans had taken over both White House and Capitol and had reconciled their differences. The last three Republican Presidential candidates had supported the reciprocity idea—which had good Republican antecedents. But a majority of Republicans in Congress had clung to protection.

"We opposed the bill passed by the Eightieth Congress. It reflected the division and confusion within the Republican Party and could be regarded only as a most unsatisfactory expedient. Its very temporariness made planning and negotiating most uncertain. And in the main it expressed the old protectionist doctrine."

As the Wall Street Journal sees it, "What looks like the preliminaries to an old-fashioned wrangle over tariff protectionism are going on in hearings of the House Ways and Means Committee."

The Journal goes on to comment:

"This newspaper believes that tariff protection, as a principle or a theory, has outlived most of its usefulness. We think the part it plays in maintaining high living standards in this country has been much exaggerated.

"Industries which have been built up in the shelter of a tariff wall can be injured, at least temporarily, when the wall is removed or lowered. But by and large, neither our employers nor their employees, fortified as they are with the world's best power tools and production methods, should fear the competition of cheap foreign labor."

And the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin says in commenting on reciprocal trade:

"One of the misdeeds of the Eightieth Congress was to throw doubt on the continuance of our policy of lowering excessive tariffs by reciprocal-trade treaties. The Republican Congress did not kill the Trade Agreements Act but it renewed it only for 1 year, and added complications in procedure which make the conclusion of trade treaties with other countries more difficult."

The action taken by the Eightieth Congress was indeed a blundering step in the field of trade policy. The present Congress can render a genuine service by correcting the error.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. To keep the agricultural picture straight, did I correctly understand the gentleman to say that all farm organizations are in favor of it?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I did not say all of them. I do not know how many there are. The National Farmers Union, the American Farm Bureau Federation, and a number of them, I will say the preponderance of them, and of their members, favor this policy. I do not think the gentleman will dispute that, and I know he cannot refute it.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I just want to keep the discussion factual. The Grange says we had better keep what we have until we get something better.

Mr. DOUGHTON. This policy has been proven by 14 years of successful operation. The gentleman knows that. Compare the national income of the United States now with what it was in 1934. The income of agriculture has increased over fivefold under the reciprocal-trade policy. Every occupation and business in the United States has prospered. Manufactures have increased sevenfold. What more proof does the gentleman want?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. The only proof that is, is that we should be in a war all the time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; that is the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. That is a fact, too. I read their testimony, and the Farm Bureau is for it, but they want to keep section 22 of the Triple-A Act so they can put an embargo on any time they want to, which your administration has done time after time for products raised south of the Mason and Dixon's line.

Mr. DOUGHTON. What does my friend want to do, abandon the reciprocal-trade program and go back to the Smoot-Hawley logrolling, back-scratching program, whereby the beneficiaries of the high tariff wrote the schedule?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. The reciprocal-trade policy as well as the tariff policy, from the viewpoint of international relationships, is deader than a dodo bird, because so many things have happened since we started out with the reciprocal-trade program.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Would my friend abandon it and go back to the old system, or would he continue it with such amendments as might be demonstrated by experience to be necessary?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I would leave the situation the way it is at the present time. We have a tribunal, the Tariff Commission, to which you can go and tell your story. I do not believe in delegating the power to the President to give away the rights of the people and to have control over every grocery bill in this country and over every farm income in this country.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Neither do I, but under this Tariff Act the farmers are given an opportunity to present their case. And if they are injured, or even threatened with injury, then under the escape clause they can have the matter reconsidered and have the agreement modified, or have the whole thing rescinded. The gentleman knows that. Every single safeguard under Heaven was provided in this bill. Those who believe in the old law are, like Ephraim of old, "joined to their idols." They cannot be convinced. You just cannot ever convince them that their idea of the old logrolling tariff is not sound policy.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. What the gentleman says may be so.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I have not yet found where my friend stands.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I told you where I stood. I stand for leaving it alone the way it is at the present time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. You mean the way it was changed by the 1948 act, or the original act?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I mean the way it is right now in the 1948 act. You had better leave it alone.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That expires in June.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. All right, then you had better extend that act the way it stands now.

You say the farmers know what is happening down here. How many farmers know right now that they recently held hearings to lower the duty on foreign types of cheese? How many farm organizations were represented at the hearings?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Everyone had an opportunity to be heard. If they were not heard it is their own fault. The public were invited to attend these hearings and an open invitation was extended by publication in the press and elsewhere so that everybody could be heard.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Suppose they do not read the Washington papers.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Why were you not at the hearings? You did not come.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I was there.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. You mean you attended the hearings of the Committee for Reciprocity Information—not the hearings of our committee.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Surely I went there, and testified about lowering the duty on cheese. I surely did.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Oh, you talk about cheese. You talk about this, that, and the other things. You never consider the innocent American consumer. You never consider our surpluses. You never consider any of those things. The interests of all groups must be considered together. The domestic consumer, the exporter, the importer, and the American public.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Do you mean to tell me it is part of the Golden Rule policy to have this administration during all this time talking about Golden Rule and the good-neighbor policy and all that goes along with that to erect the most vicious—now get this—the most severe and most vicious trade barrier ever erected in the history of our country and that is when your administration passed a bill which is on the books today which says that you cannot even send a handful of tobacco seed out of this country? Is that part of the good-neighbor policy?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No. That was an act of Congress. That was not done under the reciprocal-trade authority.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Did you see anything in the paper about any opposition by the Secretary of State?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not see everything that is in the paper, and I do not suppose that my friend does.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Possibly that was part of the Golden Rule program of the present administration.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Of course the gentleman knows that we remember things that we want to remember, and the things that we do not want to remember we shut our eyes on.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. That is right; and until this administration takes the tobacco-seed embargo off the books there is no use of President Truman talking about reciprocal trade.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman would seem to know more than the people of the country know. The people of the country, by the November election, showed what they believe. I do not say that they were so enthusiastic about the Democratic Party, but they just would not have the Republican Party. They remembered how they were wrecked under the Hoover administration, and what happened in the Eightieth Congress. The people remembered what they lost, and how they suffered under Hoover, and they realized what they had gained and what they enjoyed in 1948. There is no question as to what their position was.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. That is the second point, and I want to give you an answer now so that it will be in the book. If your administration does not watch its step it is going to give the people some Truman prosperity that is going to be similar to the Hoover prosperity you complain about.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman talks about my administration. It is not my administration, it is the people's administration. It is the administration of the American people by an overwhelming majority. And when the gentleman talks like that, he is jumping in the face of the enlightened judgment and intelligence of a majority of the American people.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. President Truman is a minority President.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, the bill H. R. 1211 here for consideration is dangerous to the safety of our economy and to our national security.

It comes to the House with vital facts suppressed. I say this because the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee flatly refused our request to invite the Military Establishment to appear before the committee and state whether or not the jeweled-watch industry, together with its respective skilled precision technicians are vital to our national defense.

We, the Republican minority, know that our domestic jeweled-watch industries have been destroyed by foreign competition to such an extent that today only two of them remain solvent. Therefore we tried, even by a record vote, to have a representative of the Military Establishment invited or requested to appear and testify before our committee touching on the importance of the jeweled-watch industry to our national defense, but our motion to obtain this vital information from this official and authoritative source was defeated by the Democrats.

There are known to be more than a hundred other strategic and critical industries located throughout the United States. The products of these industries are absolutely necessary to the defense of our country. I claim that such strategic and critical industries must not be destroyed or even so crippled that they will be inadequate for our defense purposes. Many of these industries are new and in need of every possible assistance to insure their continued success and solvency. I say with all the force and sincerity at my command that the life of these strategic and critical plants must under no circumstances be placed in jeopardy, whether from enemies within or from enemies without the United States. These vital plants and skilled workmen must not be sacrificed for political or diplomatic purposes. Alleged trade advantages, whether export or import, must not take priority over national security.

We all know that enemies from without will use every means to cripple, weaken, or destroy our long list of strategic and critical facilities. I say that when legislating, as we are today, relating to the preservation of our national security, it is no time to remove the safeguards to our national defense which H. R. 1211 proposed to do.

We hear much about the necessity of making tariff concessions in trade agreements to build up exports. But, if we weaken or sacrifice our critical and strategic defense industries to gain a temporary increase in exports, we strike a blow at the very heart of our national security. We must not let the heat of political debate blind us to the reckless folly of such a disastrous course upon which the Democratic majority now appears to be embarked.

Heretofore this Nation has been blessed with a strong foreign relations policy free from political bickering. One of the principal architects of that policy was Republican Senator VANDENBERG, of Michigan. Other prominent Republicans in the Congress played dominant roles in cementing such a policy. But since his recent election the President has evidenced a desire to abandon this bipartisan program. In the past few weeks important decisions have been made respecting our international affairs without the customary Republican participation or advance knowledge. Mr. Truman has stated that his proposed extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act is one of the cornerstones of the administration's foreign policy. He neither encouraged nor accepted Republican cooperation in the formulation of that trade policy. It becomes obvious that he is scrapping the desirable bipartisan handling of foreign affairs and that henceforth the Nation's national and international policies will be dictated by one man in the White House who increasingly refers to himself as the Commander in Chief.

Obviously also, because the New Deal needed a commander in chief, Mr. Truman feels that the Fair Deal needs one, too. A commander in chief is much more important in one-man government than is a mere President, and it is much easier for a commander in chief to assert nonexistent inherent powers over the Nation and its people such as Mr. Truman asserted in connection with his right to deal with labor-management strife without specific congressional authorization and without expressed constitutional authority. During the past 16 years we have witnessed scores of attempts to circumvent the Congress. Apparently these attempts are to continue, and during the next 4 years we may expect to see a new Commander in Chief riding around on a rejuvenated donkey looking for more inherent powers.

As a direct consequence of H. R. 1211, the President will be deprived of the most effective bipartisan fact-finding machinery ever created by law to serve the President and other governmental departments in the conduct of our foreign trade agreements program.

A trade-agreement concession based upon inaccurate or incomplete information as to its possible impact on domestic producers will be a menace to the stability of our economy and to our national defense.

I wish to call to your attention that when the trade-agreement legislation was under consideration in 1934, the proponents of it urged its adoption as a means of increasing exports. The adoption of it, however, did not increase exports.

The failure of the Trade Agreements Act of 1934 to increase exports came as a shock to its advocates. They were stunned and exasperated at their failure. But next came Hitler, then Mussolini, and finally Japan to their rescue. Hitler needed war materials to build up his military establishment for war. To his surprise he found there would be no objection on the part of the New Deal administration to his purchasing steel, refined copper, scrap copper, iron, and steel scrap.

The raid on our essential war material, in an attempt to justify the State Department's trade agreements, started in 1936 with the shipment of enough steel plate to enable Hitler to build more than 150 destroyers, or 3,000 tanks, and innumerable jeeps. No wonder Hitler thought the United States would remain neutral. But if not fully convinced of the neutral and friendly attitude because of the steel shipments to him, could he doubt the sincerity of the New Deal administration when it suffered and permitted the export to him during the years 1936, 1937, 1938, and 1939 of refined copper amounting to over 330,000,000 pounds.

"See how our exports are increasing under the trade-agreement program," said the State Department officials.

Then followed the exports to Hitler by the United States during the years 1936 to 1939, inclusive, of scrap copper amounting to over 72,000,000 pounds. When bragging about the growth of exports, the character of the exports was suppressed but the amount of the exports in dollars was emphasized.

We were getting short of iron and steel scrap, yet the administration group had to show exports to uphold the purpose of their trade agreements, so there was also exported to Hitler during 1936, 1937, 1938, and 1939 a total of over 340,000 tons of iron and steel scrap. Our boys came in personal contact with these export materials on many a battlefield in Europe.

The zeal of the State Department in the early days of the trade-agreement program knew no bounds. Exports was the only battle cry for freedom. The other propaganda slogan was perpetual peace throughout the world under the leadership of the State Department, promising peace to all who would crusade for the trade-agreements program. Yet, at the very time this hope was being held out to gain support from numerous organizations of women and anxious mothers seeking world peace, more than 10,000,000 long tons—2,240 pounds—of United States iron and steel scrap was exported during the years 1936 to 1940, inclusive, to Japan. How well I remember the day the State Department officials went into an urgent huddle with the Ways and Means Committee and asked to have the tariff removed on some of these materials. Why? Because the United States had made itself so short of these essential war materials that we had to immediately comb every inch of Central and South America and the islands in the Carribean to collect old track, old sugar mills and junk piles, wherever they could be found, to replace the exports to our enemies.

During the years 1936 to 1941, inclusive, when World War II was slowly creeping upon us, could the Army, the Navy, the Department of Agriculture, or Commerce, or any other executive department of the Government, check this madcap policy to the public by the State Department and sold under the honeyed words of "reciprocal trade." Yet today in the very period which may be leading to the fatal hour of all mankind, the Democratic majority would destroy the Tariff Commission now charged with the duty of advising the President, and hence the State Department, of the point below which tariff reduction would imperil the effectiveness of our own industries. The Democratic majority would turn from the bipartisan expert Tariff Commission to the State Department as the alpha and omega in the conduct of our trade-agreement program.

Who organized and propagandized the Citizens Reciprocity Committee to put pressure on Congress to defeat the 1948 Trade Agreements Extension Act in which every safeguard to our industries and our national security was included?

This organizer of the country-wide citizens' pressure group was, and is no other than one Alger Hiss, now under indictment for perjury. Have there been any charges made of an infiltration of spies and Communists in the State Department?

I want to call your attention to one matter because the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means called attention to the wonderful attributes of character of one Charles Taft which, of course, I do not question; however, in his zeal he said that Alger Hiss was not connected with the State Department, that he was not employed by it. Yesterday I asked for copy of a report from the Un-American Activities Committee on a few of the Communists who helped write our trade agreements and I want to read some of these to you at this point.

First as to Victor Perlo:

VICTOR PERLO

Testimony of Victor Perlo, August 9, 1948: "I think I was officially an alternate member on the Committee for Reciprocity Information and the Trade Agreements Committee, which were identical or substantially identical in membership. These were interdepartmental committees which took care of all of the technical work in the preparation of trade agreements under the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act and also to a certain extent a lot of preparatory work for the International Trade Organization."

On the same day, Miss Elizabeth Terrill Bentley, a former member of the Communist espionage ring, confronted Mr. Perlo and identified him as a member of this ring while she was active. When questioned on these charges Mr. Perlo refused to answer charging that his rights under the first and fifth amendments were being violated and that such answer "might tend to incriminate or degrade me." Perlo was also identified as a member of this ring by Whittaker Chambers on August 3, 1948.

We go next to Henry J. Wadleigh:

HENRY J. WADLEIGH

Testimony of Henry J. Wadleigh, December 9, 1948: "I was in the Division of Trade Agreements from 1936, until the war in Europe broke out * * * (superiors were) Henry Grady in the Trade Agreements Division, then Harry Hawkins, then Leo Pasvolsky, special assistant to the Secretary of State, and in Italy, Henry Grade * * * Mr. (Francis B.) Sayre was Assistant Secretary in charge of the Trade Agreements Division when I first was employed there. Mr. Acheson later took Mr. Sayre's place."

On December 6, 1948, in an executive meeting of the Committee on Un-American Activities, Whittaker Chambers identified Julian Wadleigh (Henry Julian Wadleigh) as a source from which the former received documents for transmission to representatives of the Soviet Military Intelligence. When questioned by the Committee on Un-American Activities on December 9, 1948, Mr. Wadleigh refused to answer all questions dealing with such activity on the ground that such testimony might tend to incriminate him. Mr. Wadleigh has since been a witness before a Federal grand jury in New York and it is our understanding that he has been a cooperative witness.

We come now to Alger Hiss, as to whom Mr. Taft referred as not employed in the State Department:

ALGER HISS

On December 23, 1948, Mr. Francis B. Sayre, former Assistant Secretary of State, who was in charge of the Department's Division of Trade Agreements, testified that on April 23, 1936, he recommended that Alger Hiss be appointed as his assistant in the Department of Trade Agreements. He further testified that Mr. Hiss' duties included the legal preparation of trade agreements. Hiss was transferred to another division of the State Department on January 16, 1942.

Attached herewith is the second report of the Committee on Un-American Activities on Soviet Espionage Within the United States Government. A study of this report which contains facsimiles of State Department documents emanating from the Department of Trade Agreements and, according to Mr. Chambers, furnished to him by Alger Hiss and Julian Wadleigh for transmission to the Soviet Military Intelligence agents, will disclose to some extent the proportions of this leakage of information.

Alger Hiss is now under indictment by a Federal grand jury in New York for perjury.

I have, of course, a bound volume from the same source, which I have not the time to read now, but anybody who wants to protect the United States of America and its security can get that report and read it and see just where this whole plan is taking us.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman has indicated that he has given this matter a great deal of study. Now, quite a number of representatives of the State Department appeared before our committee, and some of the things that the gentleman has stated in his statement here came out before the committee. I want to ask this: Did the gentleman see any effort on the part of anybody connected with the State Department or anybody connected with the majority party in this House that would indicate that they ever intended to get rid of those people down there, or make any effort whatever to get rid of them, and is it not a fact that the only people that they have gotten rid of are the people uncovered by the Committee on Un-American Activities of this House?

Mr. REED of New York. I thank the gentleman for that inquiry. The State Department has known of the situation since 1937. When I asked Mr. Clayton before our committee how many experts he was taking abroad to the Geneva negotiations, he has said there were either 101 or 102, I have forgotten which, and I asked him to put in the record the names of the 101 or 102 with their addresses. I had those checked by the department to which I turned on this subversive proposition, and nine of those people were going over there, and yet Mr. Clayton said at the time that they could not let us have the information that we wanted with reference to the things that we were going to trade on.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MILLS. Would the gentleman please name the committee, the department, to which he turned to obtain this information?

Mr. REED of New York. The FBI.

Mr. MILLS. Do I understand that the FBI informed the gentleman that there was some question concerning the nine men at the Geneva Convention?

Mr. REED of New York. They had all been connected in some form or other with the Communist Party.

Mr. MILLS. Would the gentleman identify for the RECORD the names of those individuals?

Mr. REED of New York. No; I would not.

Mr. MILLS. Has the gentleman submitted any statement involving any one of the nine to the State Department?

Mr. REED of New York. I have not.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman has not given the State Department the benefit of that information?

Mr. REED of New York. I have not, and for a very good reason.

Mr. MILLS. I would certainly like to suggest to the gentleman that he do that at his earliest convenience.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. I would just like to interpolate this much. Why would it not be the duty of the State Department to find out?

Mr. REED of New York. They should. They can find it out if they wish to, but they just do not care.

I want to point out in that connection that of all the spots in the United States absolutely vital to our security, the very heart of it, is in this question of the State Department. Any country that wanted to upset or overthrow this country can spend any amount of money, make any amount of effort to get people in there to write down the tariff on our vital and critical defense materials.

Mr. JENKINS. I am sure the gentleman does not want to give the impression, and I do not either, that everybody in the State Department is wrong.

Mr. REED of New York. Not at all.

Mr. JENKINS. All the gentleman is trying to say, I dare say, to the committee, is that there are a lot of people down there that are not true Americans, especially in connection with the ideas of commerce.

Mr. REED of New York. I will say this, that in the State Department there are any number of fine, splendid, patriotic Americans, and it is not fair that they should be permitted to be smeared by what everybody in this country is beginning to know, that they have been harboring subversive elements there and passing out information that is vital, and nobody will ever know how many of our boys went to their death on the battlefields of Europe because of the information peddled out by these subversive elements.

Is the State Department per se a fact-finding body? Should the State Department be legally clothed with the attributes of infallibility in furnishing information and advice to the President in negotiating trade treaties involving the national economy of our country?

Yet, this is what H. R. 1211 would do.

I call attention to the membership of the House that the 1948 act, which the Democratic majority has been called upon to repeal, made only procedural changes in the conduct of our trade-agreements program despite all false accusations to the contrary. Furthermore, let me say that we stand squarely behind these procedural changes which are centered around the so-called peril-point report. The peril-point report is nothing more than a report made by the Tariff Commission specifying the points below which it would be perilous to our domestic economy to go in reducing tariffs. The peril-point report was the outgrowth of exhaustive study and thought and was specifically designed to assist the State Department in adhering to the policy of not injuring any segment of our domestic economy in the conduct of the trade-agreement program. The reasons which dictated the creation of the peril-point report have been justified by subsequent events.

We of the Republican minority feel that it is urgent, as a bare minimum, to preserve this peril-point feature of the 1948 act by an amendment to H. R. 1211. No thinking patriotic American can oppose such an amendment which is essential to the preservation of our national economy and our national security.

In the Republican minority's proposed peril-point amendment to H. R. 1211, the only requirement is that the peril-point report of the Tariff Commission be submitted to the President for his guidance. He should have it prior to negotiating a trade agreement. He can completely ignore it and will not have to tell the Congress that he has done so. It will be submitted for his confidential information only.

Why is it so essential that the peril-point report of the Tariff Commission be made available to the President in his trade-agreement negotiations with foreign nations? It is because there is no other fact-finding agency of the Government that is so well equipped by ability and long experience, operating in a strictly bipartisan, scientific capacity as the Tariff Commission to give this important information to the President.

Since the organization in 1916 of the Tariff Commission with this special provision for bipartisan representation, the Commission has furnished to the President, to the Congress, and to the general public impartial facts and unbiased information on all tariff, foreign trade, and foreign-trade policy questions affecting the United States and other countries of the world. In doing so over the past 32 years it has established a high reputation as a scientific fact-finding agency. Its reports are accepted by representatives of both political parties in Congress and by whatever President representing either party happens to be in the White House. This basic and essential information makes it possible to establish the policy for the Government on a more sound and adequate foundation and has proved quite satisfactory to both political parties.

The Commission, as is well known, had developed and has available a vast fund of information and rather complete files of statistical and technical information collected and analyzed and summarized over its 32 years of operation on each of the items of importation under the more than 800 paragraphs of the Tariff Act. Such information has been made available in published reports of the Commission not only to the President and to the Congress but to all other agencies of the Government. These reports show the conditions affecting the competition between the many thousands of imported articles under the various tariff rates in the Tariff Act and the like or similar articles of domestic production.

Any prudent President would welcome such a report from the Tariff Commission pointing out the proposed danger to our economy and national security that might result from reducing certain tariff rates below specified points.

The President and all members of the administration testifying before the Ways and Means Committee have said that they would operate the trade-agreements program so as not to injure domestic industry. This provision merely helps them to comply with their own stated objectives. It seems peculiar that if they are really serious in stating that they will operate the program so as not to injure domestic industries that they should in any way resent having the help of this well-established bipartisan fact-finding agency. Do they object to having the Tariff Commission make findings on these matters because they themselves, the President and the State Department, expect to make findings that will injure domestic industries and threaten the security of millions of our workers from Maine to California? Are they unconcerned by the fact that day by day more American industries are operating only part time? Unemployment is mounting; exports diminishing; competitive imports increasing?

Every thinking American who has any concern for the continued prosperity of our domestic economy, the well-being of millions of workers and the fulfillment of our international commitments to the freedom-loving peoples throughout the world must support two amendments to H. R. 1211.

Because we realize that we cannot save the 1948 act, we urge that one feature of this act be maintained. This is simply the requirement that the United States Tariff Commission furnish the President for his confidential guidance a report of its findings specifying the points below which it would be perilous to our domestic economy to go in reducing tariffs.

No one can claim this amendment to be a hampering restriction, and I accuse those who oppose this amendment with the deliberate attempt to sacrifice our domestic producers and the security of millions of our workers. Accordingly, I urge that H. R. 1211 be amended to retain the peril-point report, established by the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948.

I also urge that an amendment to H. R. 1211 be made providing that all existing trade agreements that do not now contain an escape clause to the same general effect as article XIX of the General Agreements on Tariffs and Trade be modified so as to incorporate such a clause.

The reason for this second amendment is that at the present time many industries whose tariff protection has been seriously reduced in agreements prior to 1943 are unfairly discriminated against because they are denied the privilege which other industries have of appealing for relief under the escape clause. All industries should, of course, have equal treatment and a chance to have their day in court. This inequitable situation is spotlighted by the plight of the jewel-watch industry. There is no escape clause in the Swiss trade agreement made in 1936. However, there is an escape clause in all trade agreements made subsequent to 1943.

The sole purpose of these two amendments is to better the procedure leading to the negotiation of foreign trade agreements to the end that our domestic economy will not be injured in accordance with the stated policy of the President.

I charge those who oppose these two amendments with the responsibility for the economic evils which will beset us by any ill-advised tariff reduction.

I want to repeat that essential facts relating to the issues involved in the whole trade-agreements program were suppressed by the action of the Democratic majority. The Republican minority sought to have the whole Ways and Means Committee, through its distinguished chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina, Representative DOUGHTON, extend an invitation to the Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Tariff Commission to appear to testify with reference to the role of the Tariff Commission to our domestic economy in the trade-agreements negotiations. This the Democratic majority refused to do, even by a record vote. This is an astounding perversion of representative government. Thus, the Ways and Means Committee, the Members of the House, and the public are deprived of pertinent facts relating to the preservation of our domestic economy as well as our national security.

The testimony from a long list of witnesses before the Ways and Means Committee representing a large segment of our economy urged the retention of the peril-point report, and asked for an escape clause in all trade agreements. This testimony fell on the deaf ears of the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee. What is the Democratic majority saying to the country when it ignores the peril-point amendment? The Democratic majority is saying, in effect: "We are not concerned with the conduct of our trade-agreements program. We have our must orders to obey."

If the peril-point report amendment to H. R. 1211 is disregarded by the Democratic majority, then every workingman who has a stake in the continued prosperity of our Nation should hold the Democratic Party strictly accountable for the economic evils and disastrous consequences which will beset our national economy as a result of any ill-advised tariff reduction.

The Democratic majority may make light of the attempt to salvage the peril-point report and the proposed escape-clause amendment and vote against these two imperative safeguards, but devastating consequences will follow. This story illustrates my point; it was told by the distinguished lecturer John B. Gough:

"I remember riding from Buffalo to Niagara Falls, and I said to a gentleman: 'What river is that, sir?' "

"That," he said, "is Niagara River."

"It is a beautiful stream," said I, "bright, smooth, and glassy. How far off are the rapids?"

"Only a few miles," was the reply.

"Is it possible that only a few miles from us we shall find the water in the turbulence which it must show when near the rapids?"

"You will find it so, sir."

"And, so I found it, and that first sight of Niagara Falls I shall never forget. Now, launch your bark on that river; the water is smooth, beautiful, and glassy. There is a ripple at the bow of your boat, and the silvery wake it leaves behind adds to your enjoyment. You set out on your pleasure excursion. Down the stream you glide; oars, sails, and helm in proper trim. Suddenly, someone cries out from the bank: 'Young men, ahoy!' "

" 'What is it?' "

" 'The rapids are below you.' "

"Ha, ha! We have heard of the rapids, but we are not such fools as to get into them. When we find we are going too fast, then we shall up with the helm and steer to the shore; we will set the mast in the socket, hoist the sail, and speed to land. Then on, boys, don't be alarmed, there's no danger.

"Young men, ahoy there!

"What is it?

"The rapids are below you!

"Ha, ha! We will laugh and quaff; all things delight us. What care we for the future? No man ever saw it. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. We will enjoy life while we may; we will catch pleasure as it flies. This is enjoyment—time enough to steer out of danger when we are sailing too swiftly with the current.

"Young men, ahoy!

"What is it?

"Beware, beware! The rapids are below you!

"Now you feel them! See the water foaming all around! See how fast you pass that point! Up with the helm! Now turn! Pull hard; quick, quick! Pull for your lives! Pull till the blood starts from the nostrils and the veins stand like whipcord upon the brow. Set the mast in the socket, hoist the sail! Ah, ah, it is too late; faster and faster you near the awful cataract, and then, shrieking, cursing, howling, praying, over you go."

Mr. Chairman, this proposal before us today vitally affects all Americans—the farmer, the working man, the consumer. It may well determine whether we go forward to a higher standard of living with high wages, full employment, and more production; or whether we blunder into another recession or depression with production curtailed and workers on relief. America's trade policies are too vital to the Nation's welfare to trust to the whims of one man however well-intentioned that one man may be.

And so we go on, and we strike the rapids, and we go over the cataract, as we have time and again, as result of these low tariffs. We had low tariffs in the Democratic Underwood bill. And when we got into the last war what happened? Six million men out of work. Not a bit of smoke coming from a smokestack in this country. They were putting up their soup kitchens everywhere all over this Nation. What was done? The Republican Party came into power. They had these low-tariff rates revised—not as low as you have got them now. We put in a tariff bill to protect our farmers, our workmen, our industries. It was not long thereafter until we had 6,000,000 people at work again and the smoke was coming out of the smokestacks.

We have been through this disastrous mill once. When you Democrats draw a picture of 1929 why do you not look back to the time of your Underwood low tariff and see what happened. I tell you this is an American question. It is not a political question at all. It is our own national defense and our own security that is the issue. When you see the type of people who are writing these trade agreements sitting on the inside, and you know the subversive infiltrations, and the evidence is so overwhelming I cannot understand why any person who loves America should wish to support H. R. 1211, and thus permit these subversive agents to barter away our safety. We know that for years Communists have infiltrated into our departments of Government, especially into the vital spots where they can drive a dagger into the heart of Uncle Sam.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. I would like to ask you if, in 1932, when I was selling wheat for 35 cents a bushel, corn for 14 cents, and hogs for 3 cents a pound, and butterfat for 9 cents a pound, and eggs for 6 cents a dozen, and when a good milk cow would bring only $15, if those products were right then and there being protected—and I said "protected"—by the highest tariff duties in the history of this country.

Mr. REED of New York. Let me tell you, sir, that was the aftermath of a Democratic war.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. Oh, sure. You have always got to go off like that. You will not stand hitched.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield for a question.

Mr. LYNCH. I would like to know, after the gentleman has finished his discourse, in view of the fact that he has spoken against reciprocal trade agreements, and in view of the fact that he has spoken in favor of them, whether or not you are today in favor of or against reciprocal trade agreements as a principle.

Mr. REED of New York. Just as long as the State Department, like a nest of vipers—Communists, which I am sure you do not love—are on the inside, writing the trade agreements, I shall always be against them. When they are written by real Americans, as they should be, patriotic men like the gentleman who is addressing me, then it will be a different question.

Mr. LYNCH. I can understand the gentleman's point with respect to Communists, but, after all, has there been any evidence produced before the committee that Communists actually wrote or had any part in the writing of any reciprocal trade agreements, to the knowledge of the gentleman?

Mr. REED of New York. You heard what I read today.

Mr. LYNCH. Yes; I heard what you have said, but I have asked you whether or not there is any definite evidence that they actually had anything to do—these people who you say are Communists—actually were the persons in whose hands is placed the obligation of writing reciprocal trade agreements.

Mr. REED of New York. According to their own testimony. You do not need to have it in this record at all. The gentleman knows, and I have taken that position since 1934, that they should not have part in these agreements. I voted against them.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. LYNCH. Is it not a fact that if the gentleman knew of any particular person who was associated with the Communist Party or with a Communist-front organization, if the gentleman knew that any such persons had to do also with the writing of the reciprocal trade agreements, does he not think in all fairness to the Congress that he should give the names of those persons?

Mr. REED of New York. Let me tell the gentleman that in the hearings in the Senate every effort was made to let them see the minutes, and they refused. That is in the hearings; a refusal by Mr. Clayton to let them see what was in the minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, it has been my privilege to speak every time this subject has been considered here in the House. Realizing that time is limited and that many Members desire to speak, I shall ask your indulgence for a short time only on this occasion.

The pending bill, H. R. 1211, is in response to a message of the President of the United States and is a very important administration measure. It was favorably reported by a vote of 17 to 8 by the Committee on Ways and Means. I shall endeavor briefly to cover the provisions of the bill and then as time may permit to discuss the trade-agreements program. As will be observed by a reading of the bill, it contains six sections.

Section 1 embraces the title of the bill: The Trade Agreements Act of 1949.

Section 2 repeals the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948, this Republican measure to which they point with such pride on the other side of the Chamber. Section 2 repeals that act.

Section 3 of this bill provides that the period during which the President is authorized to enter into foreign-trade agreements under Section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930 as amended is extended for a period of 3 years from June 12, 1948. This means it will be extended for the customary period of 3 years from the time the last extension expired.

Section 4 deletes from the preamble of the act of 1934 certain language which is no longer applicable and is not necessary to be included.

Section 5 simply provides that the Military Establishment shall be substituted for the War Department and the Navy Department as is provided in the previous act for the reason that the act which was passed by Congress unifying the military services now provides for the Military Establishment instead of War Department and Navy Department.

Section 6 applies only to Cuba and would enable the United States to raise rather than lower certain tariff rates. That covers the provisions of the pending bill.

The trade agreements program was adopted by the act of June 12, 1934, and has been extended by the acts of 1937, 1940, 1943, 1945, and 1948. As I have said on previous occasions while discussing this program, in its far-reaching consequences to the future happiness and welfare of the people of this country and the world, it is probably the most important measure that could challenge the thoughtful attention of this Congress.

The Trade Agreements Act of 1934 conferred discretionary authority upon the President of the United States to negotiate and enter into trade agreements with other countries of the world. There has been so much confusion injected into this subject and so much discussion that is entirely irrelevant and has no application to the matter now under consideration that it might be well for us to remind ourselves of the provisions contained in the 1934 act, which is the real subject of consideration here today because all the pending bill proposes to do is to extend the provisions of the act of 1934 as it has been modified by the different extension acts since that time.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. GRANGER. As I understand the gentleman, actually the extension is only for 2 years from next June; is that right?

Mr. COOPER. That is correct. It is extended for 3 years, the customary period that has been usually done in the past, from the time it should have been extended last year when our Republican friends were in the majority and did everything they could to try to kill the program. They have opposed it all the way through and realizing that they could not go before the American people in the campaign of 1948 with a record of having completely killed the reciprocal trade-agreements program they tried to do all they could to accomplish that purpose and still be able to say that they had extended the program.

Mr. GRANGER. Going back to the last extension, the authority under the act is not changed at all with respect to the limitations of these trade agreements; is that right?

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman is correct. The purpose of this bill today is to extend the original Cordell Hull reciprocal-trade-agreement program for a period of 3 years from June 12, 1948.

Mr. GRANGER. Under this bill we would be acting according to the limitations on the power of the President to make trade agreements?

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman is correct. By briefly referring to the act of 1934, it will be observed that the act provides, among other things:

> For the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States * * * by regulating the admission of foreign goods into the United States in accordance with the characteristics and needs of the various branches of American production so that foreign markets will be made available to those branches of American production which require and are capable of developing such outlets by according corresponding market opportunities for foreign products in the United States.

For that purpose—

> The President, whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the means hereinafter specified, is authorized from time to time—
> (1) To enter into foreign trade agreements with foreign governments or instrumentalities thereof; and
> (2) To proclaim such modifications of existing duties and other import restrictions, or such additional import restrictions, or such continuance, and for such minimum periods, of existing customs or excise treatment of any article covered by foreign trade agreements, as are required or appropriate to carry out any foreign trade agreement that the President has entered into hereunder.

Now, bear this in mind:

> No proclamation shall be made increasing or decreasing by more than 50 percent any existing rate of duty or transferring any article between the dutiable and free lists.

In other words, this simply confers upon the President of the United States, the duly chosen representative of all the people of this country, the authority to negotiate these trade agreements. It simply means in practical application that we realize that we produce large surpluses of products in this country. In normal times about 55 or 60 percent of our cotton is surplus; about 40 percent of our tobacco; about 50 percent of our packing house lard, as well as vast quantities of other agricultural products are surplus. We produce that much more in this country than we normally consume.

There are countries throughout the world that need those products. If they are not sold and exported to those places throughout the world, where they are needed, and are left here on the American market, they can have only one effect, and that is to beat down the prices that our farmers receive for the products of their toil. There are vast surpluses of many industrial products, and this program simply means in practical application that the President of the United States is authorized to sit down around the table, through his chosen representatives, and say to the other countries of the world, "We have certain surplus products in this country. Many of them are needed by you. You have some products in your country that are needed by our people. Let us sit down and see if we cannot work out a trade, a trade that will be to the advantage and in the interest of the people of both countries." That is the purpose of this program, and it has worked remarkably successfully up to this time.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LYNCH. When the gentleman says, work out a trade, he means, does he not, that there would be a working-out or elimination of the various trade barriers that have been erected as the result of tariffs in the various countries; is that not a fact?

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman is correct; to stimulate the flow of trade between our country and these other countries of the world.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman spoke of commodities produced in surplus in the United States. Is it not also true that in instances where we have a less quantity produced than we consume, such as sugar, that special provisions, such as the sugar quota acts, have been enacted to take care of that situation, too?

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman is correct. In the Trade Agreements Act a direct approach was made to the trade-barrier problem. Foreign trade increased, and the increase was on a sound basis. Congress has carefully reviewed the program periodically and has approved it by extending the act. Between the years 1934 and 1935, and the years 1938 and 1939, our exports to trade-agreement countries increased by 63 percent, while our exports to non-trade-agreement countries increased by only 32 percent.

Our imports from these agreement countries increased by 22 percent, and imports from nonagreement countries by only 13 percent.

Trade agreements have been negotiated with 42 countries, and 39 of them are still in effect. Hundreds of concessions have been obtained for the benefit of products of this country and, of course, concessions have been made by us for the benefit of products of other countries. Over 65 percent of our normal foreign trade is carried on with trade-agreement countries. These countries have made concessions on something like 75 percent of their agricultural imports from this country and on something like 50 percent of imports of industrial products from this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Will the gentleman explain what position the Tariff Commission will assume in this picture if this bill passes?

Mr. COOPER. The Tariff Commission assumes the same position that it did under the original act. It participates in all the hearings, all the consideration, and even in all the negotiations, which is not true under the act of 1948.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. Not in a single instance has the Tariff Commission as such had anything to do with it.

Mr. COOPER. That just shows how little the gentleman from New York knows about it.

Mr. REED of New York. I know absolutely, sir, and the gentleman knows that I do.

Mr. COOPER. That just shows how little he knows about the program. A man who has always opposed the trade-agreement program, a man who stood right here and voted for the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, a man who has opposed all of our international program, now gets up here and tries to tell you what ought to be done with an important program like this.

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman did not answer my question.

Mr. McDONOUGH. There is evidently a difference of opinion here between two members of the committee. May I ask the gentleman to point out the section of the bill that gives the authority to the Tariff Commission to continue this authority under the bill?

Mr. COOPER. The original act contains that authority, and this pending bill extends the original act that has been in existence throughout the years.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I hope my question will not interfere with the logic of the gentleman's presentation and the manner in which he is presenting it to the House. Will the gentleman address his remarks to this wording in section 6:

Nothing in this act shall be construed to preclude the application to any product of Cuba (including products preferentially free of duty) of a rate of duty not higher than the rate applicable to the like products of other foreign countries (except the Philippines), whether or not the application of such rate involves any preferential customs treatment. No rate of duty on products of Cuba shall in any case be decreased by more than 50 percent of the rate of duty, however established, existing on January 1, 1945 (even though temporarily suspended by act of Congress).

Will the gentleman explain that?

Mr. COOPER. As I endeavored to state earlier, section 6 applies only to Cuba. It would enable the United States to raise rather than lower certain tariff rates. It comes about in this way: There are certain products that are covered in the general agreement on tariff and trade upon which United States duties were increased. By reason of the application of that situation to Cuba, which the gentleman understands occupies a peculiar position of its own, some of the rates that were included in agreements with other countries result in an advantage to the same products coming in from Cuba. Section 6 would enable these rates to be equalized. That is all it means.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Will this affect products of Mexico in like manner as those coming from Cuba?

Mr. COOPER. I do not recall any illustrations given about Mexico.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. The gentleman will realize that I represent a district where they have a great deal of winter farming, where we raise many products. The products of Cuba and of Mexico come in competition at the full bloom of our production.

Mr. COOPER. I do not think this has anything to do with that. The illustration given the committee was this: There were certain parts of chronometers originally included in the 1938 trade agreement with Great Britain, which was superseded by the Geneva agreement of last year. The result is an effective rate on British chronometer parts higher than can be applied to parts for chronometers imported from Cuba. This bill would merely enable the same rate to be applied to such Cuban imports.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Is it not true that William McKinley was considered one of the early tariff experts and that in the last speech that he made before he was unfortunately assassinated he advocated reciprocal-trade agreements, saying that the tariffs had gone as far as they could in the purpose for which they had been originally enacted and he thought that we should begin to have reciprocal-trade agreements?

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman tell me whether in his opinion there are as many restrictions today in international trade as there were in 1934 prior to the reciprocal-trade-agreements program?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly not.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman tell me whether any have been removed other than reductions in tariffs on our part?

Mr. COOPER. Yes, and the gentlemen well knows that.

Mr. Chairman, concessions were obtained on thousands of individual products which enter into the export trade of the United States. For example, over 1,400 concessions were made in our favor in the agreement with the United Kingdom, while over a thousand were made by Canada. Some 400 concessions were made by Cuba, and many concessions by other countries of the world. Every State in the Union produces some of the products on which concessions were obtained.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Out in my State we have this problem both directly and in reverse. We ship a great deal to Europe—dried fruits and things of that kind. Those who are apprehensive about the reciprocal-trade program are the people who raise nuts, such as the walnut and almond growers, of whom there are a large group in my district. The one complaint they make to me, the one complaint that they reiterate time and again is this: they say that they come to the hearings prepared with their data and submit it. They claim they have no way of knowing whether the Reciprocal Trade Committees pay a bit of attention to what they submit. Can the gentleman comment on that, please?

Mr. COOPER. I can say to the gentleman that I have heard every witness who has ever testified before the Committee on Ways and Means on this program. It has been my privilege to be a member of the committee longer than any other man on it, except our distinguished chairman. I have heard every witness who testified before our committee on this subject, and I say to you that it is my honest conviction that no American industry has been seriously injured by any of these trade agreements which have been negotiated. But more specifically answering your question, every American interest has full, ample and complete opportunity to appear before the responsible authorities of this Government, who are engaged in this important work of assembling material and information, to be considered during the negotiations on these agreements. All of them have full, ample, and complete opportunity to be heard. The original act so provides. That program is to be continued. This program is administered with the most painstaking care of anything I have ever known to be undertaken by this Government.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would also like to have the gentleman's comment on the clause in the proposed change in the act where it provides that the United States Tariff Commission's information and data shall be considered by the President. Is it working out that way, that the President does in fact consult the Tariff Commission?

Mr. COOPER. Absolutely, and the original act provides that. The Tariff Commission is to furnish data and information and material to the Interdepartmental Committee, and to the President of the United States. Under the old program which we are seeking to continue by the pending bill, the Tariff Commission itself has representatives on these various committees, and participates all the way through, even to the negotiation of the trade agreement itself, whereas, under the act of 1948, sponsored by our distinguished former colleague who is unfortunately not with us any longer, Mr. Gearhart, the Tariff Commission was taken out of all of that participation, and set apart, separate and apart to make a study and finding, without the benefit of going through all these considerations that are given by these various committees, and then was authorized to make certain reports to the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Tariff Commission hold exhaustive hearings itself, so they have ample data to give and to advise?

Mr. COOPER. Oh, the Tariff Commission is a constantly continuing agency that gives every possible thought and consideration to tariff matters.

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Chairman will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield briefly.

Mr. COLE of New York. Will the gentleman indicate to what extent, if at all, the Tariff Commission has appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, either this time or in previous years, and expressed its views with respect to the procedure by which these agreements are made?

Mr. COOPER. Members of the Tariff Commission, at least the chairman of the Tariff Commission, and I think other commissioners, have appeared many times in the past. None of them appeared this time.

Mr. COLE of New York. Were they critical of the program?

Mr. COOPER. Oh, they have always appeared in support of the program. The chairman of the Commission has more or less always taken the attitude: "I am here to give you any information, any counsel that I can"; but he has always supported the program.

We have heard considerable discussion about the value of the trade-agreement program to agriculture. Coming from an agricultural district, I am intensely interested in the welfare of our farmers, and have worked for and supported all agricultural legislation since I have been privileged to serve in this body. It is my conviction that this program is of greater value to agriculture than most any part of the life of this country. I invite your attention to the hearings, and especially to a statement by Mr. Kline, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, who appeared before the committee in support of the pending legislation. Among other things he said:

No group in the United States has a greater stake in maintaining a high level of exports than American farmers. The American farmer needs foreign markets. In 1948 the production of agricultural products was 38 percent above the prewar level.

Then, passing on to another point in Mr. Kline's statement, I quote:

We therefore support the continuation of the Trade Agreements Act for another 3-year period, and the elimination of the restrictions enacted in the 1948 extension act, which tend to hamper the successful operation of this program.

A great deal has been said from time to time on the subject of wage scales in this country and other countries of the world. I invite attention to the fact that it should be remembered that unit costs, not wages, determine the competitive position of the manufacturers. Information from our Department of Commerce shows that the output per man-hour in our factories is more than 50 percent greater than in Canada, and more than twice that in the United Kingdom. It is generally conceded that in many industries we have the lowest production costs in the world. This is confirmed by the volume and diversity of our exports to markets in which we compete on an equal basis with other manufacturing nations.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. GRANGER. I hate to take the gentleman's thought off his present subject matter, but going back to this question of the exception made in the case of Cuba; that is a departure from the favored-nations provisions of the act, is it not? Do we make other exceptions?

Mr. COOPER. We have given certain consideration in the case of Cuba for many years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I wish very briefly to touch upon one phase that is frequently mentioned and discussed, and that is the most-favored-nations policy. You will recall that this was initiated by that former distinguished Secretary of State, Charles Evans Hughes. It has been followed throughout the application of the reciprocal-trade-agreements program. Some time ago a special study was made by the State Department and the Tariff Commission of the generalization of concessions, and also the other side of the question. Those investigations show that the generalizations that we made to other countries amounted to about $30,000,000 in trade. On the other hand, by that very generalization policy we protected something like $250,000,000 worth of our own export trade. The ratio stands about $9 in benefits that we have received for every $1 of concessions we have granted. A 9-to-1 advantage is considered to be a pretty good trade.

Mr. Chairman, we realize, of course, that at this critical time in the affairs of the world this program is of greater importance than it has ever been in the past. We realize that we are now spending billions of dollars in the great European recovery program. This cannot continue indefinitely. We must try to see to it that international trade is restored to the extent that those countries now receiving financial aid from us will be able to stand on their own feet. In the European Recovery Act it is provided that the countries receiving benefits thereunder shall make an effort to reduce tariffs and trade barriers between themselves and with other countries of the world. Certainly, it is very important that we continue this program that makes it possible for us to carry on foreign trade with other countries throughout the world.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Does the gentleman feel that the European recovery program, which requires the reduction of trade barriers between European nations, can possibly succeed unless we in this country encourage that by the adoption of this program?

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman is correct. This is a very vital part of our international program. It perhaps means more than any one particular part of it and certainly we must go forward with this program as it was originally conceived by the man who stands out in bold relief as one of the greatest statesmen of all the world, our former colleague in this House, the distinguished Cordell Hull.

The purpose of this bill is to extend this program that has been tried and found beneficial to the people of this country as well as the other countries of the world, and it should receive the support of those in this Chamber who have favored our international program. This is perhaps the most important part of our effort to bring about a proper degree of recovery throughout the entire world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, for a few minutes I should like to reply to some of the arguments advanced by my very distinguished friend the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER]. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] sought to leave the impression that all the agricultural organizations in the land are in favor of the pending measure. As far as I am concerned, I think the most representative organization among the farmers of the United States is the Grange.

We had Mr. Goss, the distinguished president of the Grange, before us and here is what he stated, summing up his appraisal of the situation:

We would much prefer to see the committee—

Meaning the Ways and Means Committee—devote its time to the enactment of such legislation and let the present law stand until a sound and effective tariff measure can be passed.

By the words "present law" he means the law passed by the Republican Eightieth Congress.

There is in clear language what the president of the Grange stated.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. He also testified that the Grange had a membership of 813,000 farmers?

Mr. JENKINS. That is right. I think it is the oldest and largest of all the farm organizations. I should also like to reply to the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] when he recited to us the wonderful and beneficent effects of these trade agreements. Here is a question I should like to direct to anyone on the majority side. Is it not a well-established fact that the tariffs and trade barriers are higher against us now in every country than they were when we began to negotiate them?

Here is another thing I should like to stress. It has been brought out before our committee time after time, year after year, that the tariff authorities have never negotiated any rate upward. They have always negotiated them downward. There was a witness the other day who said, "Yes, they have negotiated one rate upward." That was on sardines. They have negotiated the rate on sardines upward. But under questions from one of our members he divided the sardines into four groups and said that they raised the rate on only one group, so three-fourths of the sardines are in the same class as everything else. They have never raised a single tariff anywhere. I can't see how it could be consistent with fair play or even the law of averages how these fellows who make these agreements could possibly claim that they were fair with our country when they could not find where they could not in one single instance give to our country a little increase in protection duties.

Why is this not reciprocal? Why is it we have to pay what they all ask every place? We take the short end of the stick all the time and every place, and if I am not stating the true facts in reference to that, I invite you to recite one single instance where these activities have raised the duty at any time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Not only are those rates higher but in addition—I want to see if the gentleman agrees with this—they impose currency controls against us which have the effect of blocking the movement of goods into those countries.

Mr. JENKINS. I cannot answer this positively that all the countries have manipulated their currency against us, but in the majority of the cases it has been done.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And our State Department continually proceeds with a program which encourages them in doing that.

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, the gentleman is absolutely right. Take Mexico. The Mexican escape clause is considered the prize agreement of all. That is considered the model escape clause. What has Mexico done? Just deliberately walked out of it. I do not think any country in the whole world has kept this agreement with us. We keep all our agreements all the time, but they renege and run out, and they change their currency and do anything they please to render the agreement nugatory.

Let me say to my good friend the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] I am proud of him, because he always extols his fellow Tennessean, Cordell Hull. But, you know, I served with Cordell Hull, and I served with Mr. JERRY COOPER. To my mind the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] far surpasses Mr. Hull both intellectually and as a statesman.

Now, let us talk a little about these negotiations. Someone asked the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] the question about how these negotiations are entered into. His reply was such that I cannot agree with it. These negotiations are such that I am reminded of the statement in the Bible where speaking of man it says that he was "fearfully and wonderfully made." My friends, I want to leave this thought with you. We questioned dozens of men who went down before these tariff committees, and we never found anybody yet who has been satisfied. Without exception every person who discussed the experiences that he had before these trade committees said in effect that their appearance before those committees was absolutely unsatisfactory. Now I would like to ask my good friend, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS], who has been a member of the Ways and Means Committee for a long time, did he ever see anybody or hear of anybody that ever appeared before us that said he was satisfied with the treatment he received down before the trade committees?

Mr. MILLS. I will answer the gentleman by saying this——

Mr. JENKINS. Well, just answer me positively "Yes" or "No" without making a speech.

Mr. MILLS. Those who appeared before our committee in opposition to the program——

Mr. JENKINS. In opposition or in favor. Answer me the question that I asked you. Did the gentleman ever hear anybody say that he was satisfied, or defended the program in any way at any time?

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman will remember Mr. Kline's statement, the head of the American Farm Bureau, when he said that they had been treated all right. The gentleman will remember the statement of Mr. Casey, representing the glove industry, where he said that they had been received properly.

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, but the gentleman knows that Mr. Casey was one of the most ardent opponents of this measure which the gentleman supports, that ever appeared before our committee.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman, of course, knows that the man who has protection does not want to give it up.

Mr. JENKINS. Certainly, and he ought not to be compelled to do so if it will destroy his business. But he told you at the same time that if he did not get some protection, he was going to go out of business. That is exactly what he said. Now, if you want to take the responsibility for putting him out of business, that is your responsibility.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman quite well remembers that Mr. Casey was concerned about imports from Japan; the program of exporting from there conducted by our own Army.

Mr. JENKINS. But this gentleman, Mr. Casey, made a very fine statement and came voluntarily. He made a statement against the program that the majority is now favoring and he was bitterly against it.

Now then, let me talk to you further about these negotiations. This system employed by these trade-agreement boys of the State Department is about the most un-American program that I have ever heard. I repeat to you, we had dozens of fine men, lawyers, agriculturists, and businessmen come before us at different times, and all complained against the treatment accorded them and not a single person at any time ever said he had fair treatment and not a single person ever knew who considered the statements and arguments made by them, or ever knew who decided against them and why the decision was made and they got no advice or information of any kind. They all said, "We go down there and a couple of nice looking fellows come out, and they are suave, and they are nice. They sit there and we tell them our story. They do not even pay much attention to it. When we are through they say we can go. We never hear another thing about it. We do not know what became of it."

That is not right, that is not treating our American taxpayer right, and it cannot be made right until some change is made.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to my friend the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. McSWEENEY. I remember the old days under the tariff programs back in the twenties when I was trying to help the clay-products industry of our State, with the cooperation of our then colleague from Ohio, Mr. Murphy. The gentleman may remember him.

Mr. JENKINS. He was a great protectionist if there ever was one. You did well to get his help.

Mr. McSWEENEY. We tried to get his help in connection with the brick, the clay-products industry, which is an important industry in our State. We could not get anywhere at that time, as the gentleman may remember.

Mr. JENKINS. That is right.

Last week one of the big brick industries in my section suspended operation temporarily, leaving 500 men out of employment. That is the result all over this country because of this program. You may wonder why I am a little zealous about this. I have hundreds of fine men in my own district who make their living working at brick and tile plants. I am interested in them.

Mr. McSWEENEY. They were not protected under the old system.

Mr. JENKINS. I will come to that a little later, when I talk about what is on the free list. But I will say to the gentleman that the duty on brick importations is now only about one-half of what it was at the time the gentleman refers to.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. NICHOLSON. If this thing goes through, will it not hurt the man who labors with his hands in this country?

Mr. JENKINS. Most assuredly. Everybody knows that the gentleman is right in his viewpoint in that connection.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman advise me just how high the tariff would have to be to protect this brick concern about which he is talking?

Mr. JENKINS. I do not know. I cannot give the gentleman the exact figures. But, as I have already said, the duty on brick has been reduced about 50 percent under these agreements. However, I would do this, if I could. I would go down there and ask them about it, or somebody should, for if I went they would not tell me. I would never find out anything about it. Some of the brick people out there just had to quit. It was no use for them to come to Washington. Oh, I know this is a free-trade program. This is a free-trade Cordell Hull program. Cordell Hull is probably the greatest free-trader America ever produced. This is Cordell Hull's program. There is no use to come to Washington. Everybody says you cannot get any satisfaction in Washington.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman is such an able member of our committee, and I mean that seriously, that I am certain he could obtain that information from the Tariff Commission.

Mr. JENKINS. If I could relieve the situation that I am talking about, if I could bring to the American people the justice to which they are entitled in connection with these matters and correct the shameful conditions that go on down there, I would quit this House today and go down there and do that job. I would be doing the greatest service for millions of our people that anybody has done for a long time.

Mr. MILLS. Would the gentleman be entirely satisfied if the House should adopt the two amendments referred to in the minority report on page 1? Would the gentleman be entirely satisfied with that program?

Mr. JENKINS. I would be satisfied with that for 1 day's work, tomorrow. I hope we get it done. That will be a fine day's work for 1 day, but I would not stop at that. I would do many other things against which our people are complaining. Many businessmen in the country are afraid to make their protests down here in Washington because they fear reprisals.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman might be satisfied on Wednesday, but he might not be satisfied on Thursday?

Mr. JENKINS. I would go further. I would do good on Wednesday, and then do more on Thursday.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman would have some more amendments on Thursday?

Mr. JENKINS. That is right; we agree.

Mr. NICHOLSON. If the gentleman will yield further, may I say that I am for anything that will help industry or the people who work in this country. If anybody is going to walk the streets, I would prefer that they walk in foreign countries, not in our country.

Mr. JENKINS. We both agree exactly.

May I take up now, the allusion that was made to Mr. McKinley's position. I do this in all humility because there is no question about Mr. McKinley's great ability and his position on the question of protective tariff. There is no question but that Mr. McKinley was the greatest tariff expert of his generation.

Mr. McKinley gave us the word "reciprocity." This is where it came from. Then as now, sometimes, I think we talk too much about the tariff, because 65 percent of all the commodities that come into the country come in free. Sixty-five percent of all our trade with all the nations comes in free of any tariff at all. That percentage was very great in Mr. McKinley's time, also, but Mr. McKinley advanced a program and said something to this effect: If we are going to let these people come in free with all their goods from all over the world, why not demand a little reciprocity? And we did demand a little reciprocity.

McKinley's theory always was—and even up to the day that he was assassinated at Buffalo, he had never retreated from that position—that reciprocity was advisable if it would be reciprocal by both parties and also that the measure of the tariff should be the difference between the cost of production in our country and the cost of production in the country from which the goods came. That was his policy all the time. That is our policy and that is my policy today. The only change is a change due to the change of world conditions. It was our duty to help some of the war-torn countries to reestablish themselves but when they became reestablished it is not necessary for us to admit free their products in competition with our products.

Let me answer if I may a few of the arguments made by my distinguished friend, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON]. I yield to no one in paying my respects to this distinguished gentleman who has lived and worked among us many, many years. He has been in Congress probably longer than some of our new Members have been on earth. But the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] laid great stress on, and so many Members speaking on the Democratic side talk so much about, the Smoot-Hawley law. Some of our new Members have come here and have heard people talk about that law. You have made speeches against the Smoot-Hawley law year after year and year after year. Do you not know that nobody on your side ever since the Smoot-Hawley law was passed has ever come up here with a bill to repeal it? No, you have not. Why does not somebody come up with a measure to repeal this nefarious monstrosity?

Nobody ever has had the temerity to do it. Why, today in practically all of the procedures under which the Tariff Commission operates they operate under that law.

What is the use in hashing up things that are of no consequence at all today, because if there is anything wrong about it, why do you not take it out? Nobody has ever tried to do it.

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. CAMP. Does not the gentleman know that the very purpose of the act which we are extending here is to permit the President to reduce the rate in the Smoot-Hawley bill where he thinks it is for the benefit of trade?

Mr. JENKINS. May I say to my friend that that is what I have been complaining about. The President and the Commission have a right to reduce these rates and they have been reducing and reducing and reducing.

He also has the right to increase the rates, but he has never increased them in a single instance.

Mr. CAMP. But his action has been on the basis of McKinley's policy of reciprocity of which you are in favor.

Mr. JENKINS. Yes; but that reciprocity applies to us as well, as I said before. When we give our market, which is by far the greatest market on earth, to the world and when we say to the whole world that 65 percent of everything that comes in can come in free, when we give them something, do you not think that they ought to give us something?

Mr. CAMP. Of course I do. And that is why we have reciprocal trade so we can get some benefits.

Mr. JENKINS. That is right, and that is what I think, too. But we do not have an organization that can give us that and we never have had.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman confuses me somewhat. He complains of the fact that we have not repealed the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act and in the next breath he complains because the tariff rates in the United States are equal to or under the Underwood Tariff Act rate. It seems to me that we have not only repealed the Smoot-Hawley tariff rates, but repealed other rates.

Mr. JENKINS. Yes; but you are repealing all the time without any consideration of the consequences. That is the way you have drawn your agreements and when they commence to pinch these foreign countries, they squeal out of it. You do nothing about it and our industry has had to bear the brunt of it and take the consequences.

Mr. MILLS. Does the gentleman contend that nothing can be done about it?

Mr. JENKINS. Why certainly, if this bill passes. Our amendments would help a great deal.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. I remember what the distinguished Henry Rainey, who was leader on that side of the House many years ago, said on the floor. He said, "You talk about repealing the Tariff Act. Why, the Republicans will not do it, and we do not dare."

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Has not the demonetization of the dollar made effective tariffs on an ad valorem basis much more effective than they would have been before the demonetization of the dollar?

Mr. JENKINS. I do not know how that would work out in figures, but I just know how they do in other parts of the world. I know how they manipulate their currency. They make the contract with us first and then they manipulate the currency to suit the contract. That is the way they do it. And do not forget that. That is one of the greatest factors in business activity in the world today—the manipulation of currency in foreign countries.

If I may proceed. I have listened to some pretty spurious arguments. I want to answer them, because I think I have the answer right here in the book.

Nearly every New Dealer who discusses the reciprocal-trade agreements says something to this effect, "Well, is it not true that business between our country and the foreign countries increased in every case as we made these trade agreements?"

They say that in every case, when we made a trade agreement, business increased with that country and it did not increase with other countries.

Now, let me give you the facts with reference to Norway and Sweden for instance. We made a contract with Sweden and we did not make one with Norway. Our business with Norway increased more than it did with Sweden, in the same time. Now, why do you make such arguments as that when they are absolutely not borne out by the facts?

Let us take Argentina and Brazil. We make a contract with Brazil and we do not make a contract with Argentina. Our trade with Argentina far surpasses our trade with Brazil in the same time. Let us go to Venezuela and Colombia. The same thing applies there. We make a trade treaty with Colombia and we do not make one with Venezuela. Business with Venezuela increased far more than it did with Colombia.

So why do you make such arguments? Why do you make arguments with reference to certain periods of inactivity? They say, "Mr. Hoover's time. Mr. Hoover's time." His time terminated in 1932. We had a Democratic Congress in 1930. When did WPA come into existence? Who ever heard of WPA up until that time?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. JENKINS. The Hull reciprocal-trade agreements were in effect in 1935, 1936, and 1937, when WPA was in effect and employed more people than any other industry. What good did the trade agreements do to the country when they were first passed? I do not say that WPA came on because of these agreements, but I say that these agreements did not do for the country what you claim they did. Mr. Chairman, I hope to develop some of these matters further as this debate progresses. I am sorry that my time has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, you will recall that during the very first days of this session, I introduced a resolution providing for a permanent delegation to the President of authority to enter into trade agreements with foreign countries. Under my bill, it would no longer have been necessary for Congress to press legislation every 2 or 3 years to keep the Reciprocal Trade Act alive. However, the Congress would have continued to keep a close eye on the President's exercise of this authority through investigatory supervision.

I still maintain that there is considerable merit in my resolution. However, as a result of the hearings held by the Ways and Means Committee and of the important revelations that were made there by the technicians and experts in charge of the day-to-day operations of the trade-agreement program, I have decided to support in full the committee bill.

I am supporting the committee bill for three important reasons:

First. The Hull reciprocal-trade program was one of the vital issues in the recent election. The people have repudiated the crippling amendments made by the Republican Eightieth Congress by refusing to reelect both the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and the chairman of the Subcommittee on Tariff and Reciprocal Trade. The author of the Gearhart bill and many who sustained him have been defeated at the polls. The plunderbund of Smoot-Hawley high-tariff boys, the American Tariff League and the Grundyites of reactionary republicanism, has been decisively checkmated.

The farmers, the housewives, and the labor unionists—all those members of the consuming public who played their part in bringing about this repudiation at the polls—have a right to expect prompt action on our part to restore the Hull program. I would be the last one to stand in the way of such positive action. Perhaps at a later date, when there is more time, the merits of my resolution can be discussed at greater length.

Second. Time is of great importance in regard to this legislation. Early in April very extensive tariff negotiations are scheduled to commence in Annecy, France, close to the Swiss border. It is essential that the United States play its full and unfettered part in these negotiations. Thirteen additional countries have indicated a desire to participate in the General Agreements on Tariffs and Trade, concluded in the autumn of 1947 between the United States and 22 other countries.

The general agreement is the most important and comprehensive trade agreement in history. By this agreement 23 nations agreed to reduce their tariffs or to maintain low tariffs or none at all on a wide variety of products. The products affected accounted in 1938 for over half of the world's international trade. In addition, the agreement includes commitments to curb the use of other trade restrictions, such as import quotas, and to limit various kinds of discrimination, such as preferental treatment of imports from one country as against those from another. Never before have so many nations combined in such an intensive effort to reduce barriers to trade.

The extension of this agreement to 13 new countries is consequently a very important step in the series of moves which the United States is making to remove barriers which stand as unnecessary obstacles to the building of a more stable and a more prosperous world.

We know that unless nations can sell each other products of their agriculture, labor, and industry to the greatest possible extent, there can be no sure foundation for economic or political peace. We know that unless trade restrictions are relaxed, the lot of the private trader in international trade will become increasingly difficult. We know that unless world trade is increased, the tremendous investment we are making in the European recovery program will be largely wasted.

Preparations for tariff negotiations take time—particularly when a large number of countries are involved. Planning for the April negotiations has been going on for over 6 months. The effectiveness of United States participation in the negotiations has been drastically hampered, despite the best efforts of the technicians, by the restrictive provisions and limited extension of the present trade-agreements law. Faced with uncertainty as to the status of the law after June 30, foreign countries unquestionably have been more reluctant to plan important and far-reaching commitments than they otherwise would have been. Faced with the prospects of niggardly offers, limited by the United States Tariff Commission's overcautious peril points, foreign countries must be contemplating niggardly offers in turn, which would result in a niggardly attempt to reduce world trade barriers.

This is no time for niggardly attempts to solve basic world problems. Bold and imaginative steps, offset by reciprocal action, must be taken and taken now, not next year or the year afterward. Realizing this as I do, and recognizing that the April negotiations should not be postponed until we decide upon a new basic trade-agreements law, I am willing to defer consideration of my resolution for a permanent trade-agreements act until a more suitable time.

Third. There is still one last reason why I am supporting unchanged the committee bill at this time. It has to do with the attitude of people throughout the world toward the United States. They are wondering how quickly and to what degree the Eighty-first Congress can reverse the reactionary isolationist trend started by the unlamented Republican Eightieth Congress. Today we face the first test. We can show the world the temper of this new Congress, and by the number of votes cast for this resolution we can make a concrete demonstration which will be talked about in Moscow, in New Delhi, in Cairo, and in all of the capitals of the earth. By this vote and by the speed with which we act we can show again that America is alive to the grave economic problems facing the peoples in most of the world outside our frontiers and that we are prepared to do our fair share toward helping to solve these problems. We can effectively take the wind out of the sails of those who keep propagandizing the colonial peoples, to the rising younger nationalities, and to the poverty-ridden everywhere. We can say with reason and with confidence, pointing to this law and the action that will be taken under it, that this country will continue to do its share and more than its share to the end that men everywhere will have a better chance for economic as well as political freedom in the years immediately ahead. We will thus assure the peaceful and economic future of America; of this there can be no doubt.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to read into the RECORD a statement by the Detroit Board of Commerce. It constitutes unchallengeable and documentary evidence the value and effectiveness of which cannot be refuted.

DETROIT BOARD OF COMMERCE,
Detroit, Mich., February 4, 1949.

STATEMENT ON EXTENSION OF THE RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT ON BEHALF OF THE DETROIT BOARD OF COMMERCE

To Members of the House Ways and Means Committee:

The world affairs committee of the Detroit Board of Commerce has always, in the past, strongly supported the reciprocal-trade-agreements program. In conformance with the traditional policy, the world affairs committee respectfully urges that H. R. 1211 be favorably reported by your committee and be passed by Congress.

DETROIT AND MICHIGAN'S INTEREST IN WORLD TRADE

The city of Detroit and the State of Michigan both have a vital interest in a successful trade-agreements program. The following facts indicate the paramount importance of a healthy world trade to the economy of this area:

1. The Detroit area is the world's largest producer of industrial products for export.

2. Over 900 Michigan firms are actively engaged in some form of world trade.

3. It has been estimated that one out of every seven dollars spent in this area was derived from foreign sales.

4. More than 300 imported items are necessary for the production of automobiles in Detroit.

5. Many chemical, pharmaceutical, paint, machinery, and other industrial firms in this area are dependent upon imported raw materials.

6. Over 100 oceangoing steamship companies maintain offices in Detroit.

7. During the navigation season oceangoing vessels ply the waters between the port of Detroit and the ports of Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Holland, Belgium, England, Venezuela, and Colombia.

8. Air lines connect Detroit with nearly every major commercial center in the world.

Michigan fathered modern industrialization with the development of mass production methods in the automotive industry. With this development came the need of mass consumption and mass markets. A decline in consumption or a limitation of markets wreaks havoc upon our industrial society. Thousands of workers become idle, expensive equipment and machinery lies useless, purchasing power declines, and the resultant economic stagnation creates a tremendous burden for the city, State, and Federal Governments. Both agricultural and industrial interests suffer. Detroit industries believe every effort must be made for the expansion of world trade and the maintenance of world markets. A workable reciprocal-trade-agreements program can contribute to the realization of this goal.

The catastrophic effects of the last war have made it difficult for many nations of the world to compete in the world's markets or to purchase the products we produce. Dollar shortages have appeared in every corner of the globe giving an impetus to the demand for increased tariff walls, quota restrictions, preferential tariffs, regional trade systems, bilateral trade agreements, exchange controls, and other types of trade barriers. These are largely designed to limit United States participation in the exploitation of world markets. We believe the reciprocal trade agreements program is an effective method of combating the present trend.

Opponents of the reciprocal trade agreements program argue that the curtailment of our export trade would have little effect upon our economy as it represents only about 10 percent of our total production. They claim that increased imports of products produced by cheap labor will cause unemployment and economic hardship to both labor and industry groups in the United States.

Though our exports may represent only about 10 percent of production, that 10 percent may often be the difference between profit and loss. It may represent an increased volume of production making possible a lower per unit cost. It affords stability to Detroit manufacturers and labor by mitigating the effects of slack periods in the domestic market. During severe depressions in the domestic market, export has made possible the continued operation of a number of Detroit industries that might otherwise have had to close down operations.

The claim that the importation of products produced by so-called cheap labor will be injurious to employment in this country is fallacious. Foreign labor is not cheap. Productivity as well as wages determines value of labor. The employees of Detroit industries, as a result of the heavy investment in equipment, tools, and machinery and improved techniques of production, are competitive with other labor groups all over the world. On the other hand, the undue protection of uncompetitive labor in other domestic industries results in a lower standard of living and the limitation of markets to the detriment of the more economic industries.

CONCLUSION

Trade agreements executed in the past have been beneficial to a great majority of Detroit and Michigan industries. Agricultural interest has also benefited from the reciprocal trade agreements program.

Never before in history has the need for a healthy world economy been as apparent as it is today. Nations throughout the world need the products and the production know-how available here in Detroit for the rehabilitation and the reconstruction of their war-torn Communist-threatened economies. We cannot afford to refuse their demands. On the other hand, we cannot afford to continue indefinitely the process of giving away the bulk of our exports without receiving payment as has been the case in the past. It is imperative that markets for the world be opened to Detroit and Michigan industries and that the means of payment for these products be available, thus relieving the American taxpayer of the burden of paying for our own exports.

Therefore, the world affairs committee of the Detroit Board of Commerce urges the Ways and Means Committee to favorably report on H. R. 1211 and it be passed by Congress.

Respectfully submitted.

WORLD AFFAIRS COMMITTEE, DETROIT BOARD OF COMMERCE, RICHARD B. FROST, Secretary.

VERIFICATION

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
County of Wayne:

Personally appeared before the undersigned authority, Richard B. Frost, who being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is secretary of the world affairs committee of the Detroit Board of Commerce, Detroit, Mich., and that he executed the foregoing instrument and that the allegations of fact therein are true and correct to the best of his knowledge and belief.

RICHARD B. FROST,
Secretary, World Affairs Committee, Detroit Board of Commerce.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 4th day of February 1949.

NICHOLAS J. RINI,
Notary Public, Wayne County, State of Michigan.

My commission expires November 23, 1952.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CAMP].

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Chairman, the present joint resolution to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, which, if passed, will enable the President through the Secretary of State, to continue for another 3-year period to enter into foreign-trade agreements or reciprocal trade agreements, is as important legislation as will come before this session of Congress. It affects the prosperity of every American. To my way of thinking, it is the greatest hope we have of keeping up our present high levels of employment as well as the high income of farms, mines, and factories.

There was a time when our foreign trade was of such proportions that the specter of unemployment was unknown and the worry of our cotton and grain farmers was not the question of markets but the problem of supplying the world demand. Ships bearing cargoes of American manufactured goods and agricultural products sailed the seven seas, our ports were beehives of commercial activity, and our people enjoyed a firm and stable prosperity.

In other words, we traded with the world. We brought to our country goods from all over the world, and we sold to the world our entire surplus of manufactured goods and agricultural products.

In 1933 the new administration at Washington began a study of the causes of the loss of our world trade. The President had called to his aid as Secretary of State a statesman who had given many years of his life to the study of world trade and tariffs and who had foreseen the inevitable result of the iniquitous tariff policy of the Government under the Republican administrations. This quiet and studious man from the rugged State of Tennessee, Hon. Cordell Hull, believed that by making reciprocal treaties with the foreign countries much of our trade could be revived and prosperity gradually brought back. So the Congress passed the act of June 12, 1934, empowering the President to make these reciprocal trade agreements.

What are these trade agreements? They are nothing more nor less than a method of breaking up the log jam and opening up the trade channels between our country and the other countries of the world.

Some people have an erroneous idea of the meaning of foreign or world trade. They seem to cling to the idea that trading with the world means selling the rest of the world our goods without buying any of theirs. Trading means the exchange of goods for goods—just as the farmer takes his produce to town and exchanges it for the supplies he needs, as the trapper on the frontier used to exchange his furs for food and clothing. So we see that if we will have world trade we must take the goods and products of other countries in exchange for ours. We must buy as well as sell. To revive this trading a Democratic administration devised these reciprocal trade agreements. These agreements made it easier for the foreign buyers of our goods to find a market for their goods here. Each one provides increased opportunities for a country to expand its purchases of our goods; provides that the trade of one country shall be treated fairly by the other country to the agreement relative to the trade of a third country, thereby preventing discrimination.

These trade treaties became necessary because as we built high tariff walls in this country, other countries of the world retaliated by building high tariff walls against our goods and these tariffs became formidable barriers to world trade. It was found to be impossible to get rid of all these trade barriers at once, but these trade agreements, by reducing our tariffs on some goods in exchange for an agreement on the part of another country to reduce its tariffs and other restrictions on our goods, encouraged trade instead of discouraging it.

These trade agreements are openly and fairly made. A clear description of the method of their negotiation is as follows:

Before we enter into trade-agreement negotiations with a country, public announcement is made of our intention to do so. The trade-agreements work is conducted by the Trade Agreements Committee, an interdepartmental undertaking in which participate the Departments of State, Treasury, Agriculture, and Commerce, and the Tariff Commission. This committee is made up of nonpartisan experts, men of experience and judgment in foreign trade, who have no interest in anything except what is best for the country as a whole.

As a result of study of the trade and products of the two countries, there is published at the time announcement is made of intention to negotiate a trade agreement a list of products in respect of which we will consider making concessions to the other country.

When these products have been announced in this open and aboveboard manner, so that everybody who produces or deals in these products may know about it, then a date is set when all interested persons may be heard. If you do not think a product in which you are interested should be included in these negotiations, you have a full chance to say so. You can appear before the Committee for Reciprocity Information at public hearings in Washington and state your case, or you can file a written brief of your arguments and have them carefully considered. In one way or another everybody affected has a chance to be heard—an equal chance. There are no back-door methods; no chances for lobbyists to exert political pressure; no secret deals or swaps.

Why has the trade agreements program become so universally accepted? Even men who have made a career out of fighting the program no longer speak of outright repeal of the Trade Agreements Act. They only dare use the back door and try to weaken the program through crippling amendments.

The reason why trade agreements are today so universally acclaimed is not hard to find. Trade agreements make a vitally important contribution both to our domestic prosperity and to the success of our foreign policy. Let us consider how this is so.

First, as to our domestic prosperity. America is now the world's largest foreign trading nation; our domestic economy is geared into the world economy. We need to export to keep our present high level of production. A falling off of exports of just one product has effects which reverberate throughout our economy. But if we want to continue our exports we must also be willing to import. We cannot sell unless we buy. Furthermore, imports are valuable in their own right because they raise our standard of living and supply us with raw materials on which our production depends. A large volume of both exports and imports is therefore essential to our domestic prosperity. What is the best way to insure that this volume will be large? Obviously by reducing trade barriers and allowing the forces of competition to determine the flow of goods among nations. Trade agreements are designed to accomplish just this.

There is another reason why trade agreements are vitally important to our domestic economy. We in America believe in the system of free competition. We know that America owes its economic strength to that system. Trade among nations today is not free, but is largely regulated and controlled by governments through bilateral agreements, exchange controls, and quotas. When nations regulate and control their foreign trade in this fashion, they sooner or later find it necessary to control their domestic trade as well. If our system of free competition is to survive and if our own prosperity is to continue, we must convince the world of the value of reducing and eliminating these governmentally-imposed barriers to trade. The trade agreements program has been invaluable for teaching this lesson to the world. With its aid, we have led in the fight to reduce and eliminate controls and barriers on international trade. We must continue to lead in this fight if we want to convince the world of the superiority of our economic system.

No one can question, therefore, the value of trade agreements to our domestic economy. This alone would be sufficient reason for renewal of the act. But it is when we turn to foreign policy that the case for trade agreements becomes overwhelmingly convincing.

Our foreign policy aims at the establishment of a peaceful world in which democratic, free institutions flourish. Our economic foreign policy supports this ultimate goal by creating the prosperity and economic stability which is the surest foundation upon which to build a peaceful, democratic, and free world.

The great depression and World War II made the goals of our economic policy difficult to achieve. The depression left a heritage of economic controls. The war added to these controls and left many other scars on the world economy. The industrial plants of many nations were nearly destroyed, transportation and normal business channels were disrupted, and basic commodies were in severely short supply. Faced with such conditions, war-torn nations could take no other source of action but to invoke controls, make barter deals, and resort to a host of other restrictive devices. When trade is artificially channeled, the volume of trade falls off and the flow of goods slows down to a trickle. Most of these countries recognized that the controls which they imposed were not going to assist them in the permanent solution of their problems but they were not in a strong enough economic position to take any other course of action.

American economic policy is aimed at breaking down these depression-born and war-fostered barriers which block the flow of goods and deny to the world the prosperity which comes from a mutual sharing of goods. We are in a strong enough economic position to take the lead. We have obtained, in the last few years, some very important commitments to remove these controls just as soon as it is economically practicable and possible to do so. Trade agreements have proved to be one of the most effective weapons in this battle against trade barriers and in obtaining these significant commitments.

Furthermore, trade agreements have stood the test of time; they have been in successful operation for 15 years. Trade agreements are concrete and down to earth; they face the problem squarely by reducing specific barriers on specific goods.

Trade agreements are not the only means we are using to achieve the goals of our economic foreign policy. We also have the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank, the vitally important European reconstruction program and the proposed International Trade Organization. The trade-agreements program is interlocked with these programs. The success of one depends upon the success of the other.

The International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development are designed to establish financial conditions that will contribute to a maximum expansion of world trade. The function of the fund is to prevent abnormal fluctuations in exchange rates. The bank reinforces the efforts of the fund by granting long-term loans to war-devastated and economically underdeveloped countries. Thus, both institutions supplement each other and assist in expanding trade.

The Foreign Assistance Act of 1948 provides that nations participating in the recovery effort must cooperate to reduce trade barriers. The United States should be the leader in carrying this out. By enacting strong trade agreement legislation, we can show that we mean business when we talk about reducing trade barriers. Furthermore, the long-run success of the European recovery program hinges on reduced trade barriers. The goal of the program is to make the countries of Europe self-supporting. If they are to pay for what they buy, they will have to earn by selling to other countries. Such selling would be impossible if the channels of trade are clogged with barriers.

The proposed International Trade Organization is another vitally important arm of our foreign economic policy. We have been the leaders in persuading the world to accept the code of fair trade practices embodied in the ITO Charter, and that charter stresses that member countries shall negotiate for reduction of trade barriers. We need a workable and effective Trade Agreements Act as the authorization to carry out this undertaking.

But trade agreements do more than help us establish world prosperity and economic stability. They contribute to the ultimate goal of our foreign policy —the establishment of a free and peaceful world, in which democratic institutions flourish. Trade agreements help in two ways. First, they contribute to peace by reducing and limiting the use of trade barriers which are a major source of friction among nations. Second, they contribute to freedom and democracy by bringing the internal prosperity which is the best antidote to communism.

It is this, in the last analysis, which is the most compelling reason for the continuance of a strong trade agreements program. We have become the rallying point for the free nations of the world.

The free world looks to us for leadership. Every move we make is watched. If we make one faltering step, incalculable harm may be done. In the eyes of the world, a weak Trade Agreements Act is such a faltering step. A strong 3-year Trade Agreements Act, on the other hand, would be a clear sign that we are continuing resolutely on the course we have set for ourselves and our friends.

I have listened with interest to some of the arguments of those who do not favor the reciprocal-trade-agreements program. I have heard them say that the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill of 1930 had not been repealed. I cannot understand why they protest for under this reciprocal-trade-agreements program it has been effectually and properly repealed.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I wish to ask the gentleman why it is that we have to pay 35 and 40 cents for a package of Piedmonts, Camels, or Lucky Strike cigarettes up in Canada. The gentleman is talking about reciprocity. Will he tell me why we have to do that?

Mr. CAMP. I do not know anything about the price of things in Canada or how the prices are made up. I do know that our trade agreement with Canada has given us great concessions, and that we are now exporting to Canada a great quantity of agricultural products from my section of the country that we did not export to them before our trade agreement with them. I do not know what part of the price of cigarettes in Canada is tax, but I do know that when you buy a package in the United States some three-quarters or more of the price is made up of tax.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CAMP. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman; but remember I do not have very much time, and I do not want to spend it all in a dialogue with one Member.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I do not desire to take any of the gentleman's time because I believe that tobacco, cotton, and the other commodities that we raise here should be protected in these United States. Furthermore, if the gentleman ever went into a foreign country he would know that we cannot sell tobacco, cotton, or anything else because there is no reciprocity in the other countries.

Mr. CAMP. I do not know what countries the gentleman refers to; but we are trying our dead level best to get reciprocity with all countries. If you kill this bill you will destroy the only means you have of obtaining reciprocity.

Now, my good friend whom I respect very greatly, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] asked my colleague from Arkansas if he has ever seen anybody satisfied who came before our committee. I will ask him this: Have you ever heard any of these people who came before us who did not start off just like our constituents back home used to talk to us about the price-control bill: "Oh, I am in favor of price control but—"? They say, "Oh, yes; I am in favor of the Trade Agreements Act, but—"; and we are all in favor of it; are we not?

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. I am surprised at the gentleman because he is one of the brightest men in this House. I did not say anything about them being dissatisfied with coming before our committee. I said they were dissatisfied with going down to the tariff people.

Mr. CAMP. Oh, I am talking about the reciprocal-trade-agreements program.

Mr. Chairman, last Christmas a year ago I wanted to give my wife some dishes. She had asked for some chinaware a month or two before, and I thought I would kill two birds with one stone by giving them to her on Christmas. So I went into a store here in Washington and asked for chinaware. They were very nice to me. They took me over and introduced me to the head of the department. He said, "Mr. CAMP, I am ashamed to take you into our department. We do not have anything." So I went over to another large store and told the lady clerk that I wanted to give my wife some nice china for Christmas. "Oh, well," she says, "we have got just one set." So you see that one of the largest department stores here in Washington had only one set to offer.

Well, I thought that was bad. I thought there must be a good demand for chinaware in Washington, and perhaps I could get it in Atlanta. So I went into a store in Atlanta and the same thing was told me.

Yet here last year when we had hearings, the chinaware men came before us scared to death of this trade agreements act. I asked one the question, "Are you selling your product?" "Yes." "Do you have any unfilled orders?" "Oh, yes, for a year or two." "Well, what is the matter with you?"

Mr. Chairman, the whole trouble is fear. We recently had a great man in this country who used to say that fear was the greatest enemy of mankind. These people are afraid that in some 5 or 10 years from now or maybe in 3 years from now they will catch up on the backlog of orders and some Frenchman might send in a little beautiful chinaware and it might be sold to a man who wants to give his wife a Christmas present, who could not otherwise find the china. If we will take some of this product that can be sold here and not hurt our chinaware manufacturers, and ship them some bales of cotton over there, or some cheese, or something else we can spare, we will be helping the American farmer and at the same time satisfying the man who wants to give his wife a present.

I cannot understand how anybody can possibly oppose a program so fairly administered. You talk about not getting satisfaction from the Tariff Commission or the Trade Agreements Administration. Why, under this law the Tariff Commission, the Army and Navy, the military establishments, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce jointly with the Secretary of State hold hearings. They meet and work out each item on the list and before they will negotiate an agreement they publish to all the manufacturers of products to be included or, if an agricultural product, to all of the producers of it a list of the articles they are going to talk about. They invite those people to appear before the committee.

There was a time when people came to America in search of every product we produced. There was a time when my great State of Georgia had British agents going over it begging our farmers to plant more acres of cotton so they could get the cotton. That same thing brought about the greatest expansion of trade that any State has ever enjoyed. During that time when we could sell all we could produce and the world market would take everything we had to offer, my State built the first railroad that was ever built in the United States. Fifty miles long, and later the first one that was 100 miles long. We built in our own docks with Georgia money the first steamship that ever crossed the Atlantic Ocean. The reason was we had a market for what we produced. But when times changed, and our surplus crops could not be sold abroad it stagnated the home market, and no section of this land has suffered more from the loss of export markets than my section.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. GRANGER. I just want to say this to the gentleman and to the committee. The question has been raised here by the gentleman from Ohio, who refused to yield to me, and I think there is some substance to that, as to the reception that is given to Members of Congress down before the Reciprocal Trade Committee. It seems when you go down there that they are not interested; they are just about as warm and responsive and receptive as a frozen Eskimo. They evidently do not care anything about what you say there, or, at least, that is the way you feel. I think it is wrong and I think it is subject to criticism. Perhaps you people who have not been down there have not had the experience, but that is the feeling I have.

Mr. CAMP. Well, I have been down before them. I have raised sand about some of the items they were considering but I think that the program is not to blame. I think that the administration may be a little wrong. Let us correct the administration if it is wrong, and not disturb this great program.

Under this program I think our President can and will perform our greatest act in bringing about world peace, and that is by reviving world trade. People that are trading with each other do not hate each other. Trade will prevent war because it will keep people at work. Trade will bring on prosperity because it will give to us in the foreign countries a market for our surpluses. It is that great fear of unsold surpluses that hovers over our economy today and keeps us from going forward as we should.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON].

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I hope very much that if my good friend and able committeeman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CAMP], has not as yet procured for his wife the fine set of dishware he sought a year or two ago, he might do so now. I suggest he go to one of the great department stores downtown and he there will find he has a wide choice of chinaware. If his experience should be anything like the experience of my wife within the past week, he will return to his home and upon opening the package discover that he has bought some chinaware which was made in England. Or, possibly, in Czechoslovakia. Then, if he should continue his trip on out into the western part of Pennsylvania, or specifically into the eastern and southern part of Ohio, he will there find on the unemployment rolls American workmen who can and should be making that chinaware which would be sold here in these stores. Instead, the American skilled worker sits idly by as the cheap labor overseas produces china. That has taken place in the chinaware industry and it is taking place in some half dozen other industries right now, today, in the United States. It is taking place because goods are imported from overseas for sale here at prices less than the American workingman can or will produce those goods for sale here. Part of the reason is that the tariffs are so low that the American workingman in these industries to which I refer is not protected.

Earlier in the day the statement was made that the Tariff Commission under the law as it existed prior to 1948 did sit upon the various committees which are charged with preparing the trade agreements. That is not correct. That is not in accordance with the hearings. As has been testified by Mr. Ryder, Chairman of the Tariff Commission, members of that Commission do meet with the various committees in the preparation of trade agreements, but they do so unofficially. They do not; they never appear and speak for the Tariff Commission.

It is the purpose of those of us on this side of the House to offer an amendment to the bill (H. R. 1211) tomorrow which will impose upon the Tariff Commission the continued duty of determining just what the peril point is with respect to any commodity which is up for negotiation. The peril point is the Tariff Commission's finding as to that rate below which any reduction in tariff would damage or threaten serious damage to an American industry. I shall not argue the merits of that amendment at the moment. I hope to do so tomorrow. But I cannot conceive of anyone in this great body opposing the President's having the knowledge and advice of the Tariff Commission, that highly valued and respected branch of the Congress, as to just what they believe to be a point below which a tariff should not be cut. We will be doing a service to the President, we will be doing a great service to this Congress, and we will be doing a greater service to the American workingman and to industry in general if we do provide that the President be given that information. The Tariff Commission is the only group in all the United States that has the ability, the background, and the courage, if you please, to do its duty and to say, "Here is the level below which, if American industry is to be protected, you must not go in cutting tariff."

I think it is most unfortunate that we do not have the benefit of long hearings by the Committee on Ways and Means on the bill we are now considering. No one appeared before our committee other than at his or her personal request. The committee did not invite anyone to appear. The committee took the position that anyone who chose to come before the committee and to talk about the bill H. R. 1211 might do so, and the committee would be glad to listen.

Whoever heard of an investigation being made in that way? We are all familiar with the fact that when you want to learn something about a subject you usually ask the people who do not rush forward volunteering information. In our congressional committees we request representatives of various departments of the Government to come before the committee and present their case. That is the way to get the information; that is the way to learn about the bills that are up for consideration. But our committee chose only to hear volunteers.

We went further than that, as you have been told, and we specifically voted that we would not invite to come before our committee members of the Tariff Commission, that group which I have previously said has the most information about tariff cuts, and incidentally the group that is affected more than any other group by the bill we are now considering.

Incidentally our committee would not invite the group who are affected by the bill we are considering more than any other group. Our committee would not invite them to come and be heard and they did not see fit to volunteer. Likewise we did not have before us the military in the face of repeated statements that our strategic materials and our very national security is jeopardized by the operation of parts of this reciprocal-trade-agreements program. In view of that and in view of the allegations that this trade-agreements program is a most important part in our international program today, I submit it was not proper that we come before you today without complete hearings on those subjects.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Would the gentleman mind telling the committee how long the hearings lasted last year, and whether or not the press or the public were permitted to participate in those hearings.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I am very happy to tell the gentleman that they lasted only a short time and I would also point out that the extension was only for one year. I admit it was contemplated that there would be hearings again this year. Perhaps undoubtedly we were wrong as to who might be in charge of the hearings this year, but the fact remains that it was contemplated that hearings would be held again this year.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Were the hearings open?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. The subcommittee hearings were not open.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Were the full committee hearings open?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. They were not open.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he remembers that I came before the committee and was not allowed to say a word.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I seem to recollect that, yes.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman would yield, I would not like for that to remain in the RECORD, without a clarification. The gentleman appeared before the committee and he said, "My position is the same as the position of the gentleman who just testified before the committee." I believe that that was the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES].

He also said, "I take the same position that the gentleman does, and I have no further statement to make." If I am wrong about that, I would like to be corrected.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I do not want to get involved in any controversy between the two gentleman. I appreciate what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER] has put in the RECORD.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I do not like for any Member of the Congress to say on the floor of the House that the Committee on Ways and Means has not given them an opportunity to be heard, because that simply is not in conformity with the fact or the policy of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I rise at this point so that there would not stand in the RECORD a statement which I believe was based on a misunderstanding of the question posed by the gentleman from Louisiana. He inquired as to whether or not the committee hearings during the Eightieth Congress were open hearings. I remind the gentleman that beginning on March 26, 1947, the committee held hearings up to May 9. Those hearings are published and available to the gentleman from Louisiana. They consist of over 1,731 pages of testimony, all of which was in open hearings.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. In the past in considering these trade agreements, I am convinced the committee had in mind the fact that industry in our country should be protected. They did not go out and trade them down the river. In accordance with the testimony before our committe any industry which was seriously damaged, or threatened with serious damage would have the right to come before an appropriate committee and make a protest and at least hope to have some measure of relief. But there was an element spoken of as Yankee ingenuity or Yankee trading, if you please, which was the then announced basis upon which our negotiators worked with the negotiators for foreign countries. We came back from these trade-agreement meetings and at one time and another we claimed success. We sought to measure our success, and we seemed to glory in the fact that we were getting the better of the bargain. I submit to you that as of this day there is a new consideration found in the minds of our negotiators as they travel the world over considering reducing tariffs.

The new factor may be called a political consideration. Indeed Mr. Thorpe, in appearing before our committee, stated in effect that the protectionist idea was no longer a controlling matter with respect to the cutting of tariffs. There were other considerations, and under questioning he stated that conditions throughout the world in general was one of the other factors.

So I submit that no longer is the welfare of industry the only or the principal consideration as to whether or not tariff cuts should be made. Today the consideration that, in my opinion, dominates, is the matter of political wisdom as to whether cuts should or should not be made.

We are told that the trade-agreements program is part of the greater American program to improve the stature of the other nations of the world and that as such we must support our Government's policies. The great foreign relief program we are using today is the European recovery program, headed by Mr. Paul Hoffman, a great industrialist of our Nation. Undoubtedly he is doing an excellent job. My plea to you as Members of Congress is this, that in considering this trade agreement we should see its place in the over-all picture, which includes the European recovery program.

In that connection I would like to point to a statement by Walter Lippmann, wherein he points out that American industry must prepare itself to take a loss, to make sacrifices, if the European recovery program is to work.

Then I have a statement from Mr. Paul Hoffman, and this is enlightening to a Member of Congress today, one who has not particularly thought about what the European recovery program might mean to a business in his or her congressional district. He says:

> The hope of European economic recovery does not lie in piling up a greater deficit in trade with the Western Hemisphere. What we hope to see is a gradual reduction in Europe's dependence on Western Hemisphere supplies and a marked increase in its exports to the Americas. That way lies Europe's hope of long-range solvency.

Then he goes along and he says this:

> If this must be done—

That is, if more imports must come here and fewer exports go abroad, he says:

> If this must be done at the expense of American exporters, I would remind you it it the only way for European creditors and debtors to settle their accounts.

The countries of Europe that are in the Marshall plan have recently filed a report with Mr. Hoffman. In that report they make no bones about this fact, that it is their deliberate purpose to do all the trading they can within the confines of the various countries participating in the European recovery plan. They do not plan to trade with the United States at all, so far as purchases are concerned, if they can avoid it, and they will not take our surpluses if they can get the surpluses somewhere else. However they do plan to sell us more and more of their products. That is all in black and white in this official report which has been made and which states that in 1952 and 1953, when the 4 years of the Marshall plan shall have been passed, there will then nevertheless be an adverse trade balance against the United States from a European viewpoint. In other words, Europe will not then be entirely self-supporting, but will owe the Western Hemisphere one or two billions of dollars.

So those of us who may be inclined to think that the Marshall plan will provide more moneys which will in turn purchase our supplies which are in surplus, have another guess coming. Europe will do all she possibly can to buy from within the zone represented by the member nations of the European recovery program.

Indeed, in Great Britain, in accordance with their report not yet made public, it is their plan to cut purchases from the United States over 1947 by some $997,000,000. It is Great Britain's announced plan to ship into the United States $794,000,000 more goods than she did in 1947 and to reduce imports from our country by $997,000,000, a difference of $1,600,000,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. PERKINS. Is the gentleman in sympathy with the European recovery program?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I am; I supported it and I am in sympathy with it; I hope to continue to do so. My point is that the American producer must be realistic and realize that there is a sacrifice required of every industrialist in this country.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman consider that the reciprocal-trade-agreements program is needed as an active part of the Marshall plan?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I do not. We must remain strong if we are to continue to be the source of these assets which presently are so vital to the recovery of Europe; we in this country must remain strong or we will not be able to help overseas.

Mr. PERKINS. In other words, the gentleman believes we should pursue the same path that we followed after World War I; is that correct?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. That does not follow. I submit that today in making gifts to Europe we are imposing a burden upon the American citizen by sending some of the products of his work to help the people overseas just as in the 1920's we did that, only at that time we sent it over disguised as loans.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman's position is like mine that when foreign recovery reaches the point where the foreign countries are able to compete with us disastrously then it is time to do something else.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes; and the long-range program does not contemplate the free-trade markets between the United States and Europe that we did have after the last war when the European trade balance was favorable to us; they took so much more from us than we took from them that at the end of the year they had to settle with us in gold. That has been against us from their standpoint, they have not been self-supporting. It is a trend which has existed in European international trade for many, many years; hence, it must be an accepted fact that to help Europe recover we are to be deliberately discriminated against. Under present policies through the use of import licenses, only selected exports from the United States may enter the British Isles. These controls will be closer and closer as time passes. Soon we will sell nothing to Europe she can make herself, and we will be expected to open our doors for all the surplus manufactured goods Europe can produce.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. COOPER. I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LYNCH].

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, I am thoroughly in accord with H. R. 1211, introduced by the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. DOUGHTON]. It is a bill that will, when enacted, be of tremendous value in again setting in motion the machinery for reducing world trade barriers. It was this machinery that our Republican colleagues, when they were in the majority in the Eightieth Congress, sought to sabotage with crippling restrictions. Although some damage was done to world trade by the hampering restrictions of the 1948 Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, fortunately for this country and the countries of the world who are adhering to the capitalistic system, we, by the passage of the present bill, will be able to repair the damage. Trade barriers have long been a cause of war, and therefore it is in the interests of world peace and our own national security that, as far as possible, these barriers be eliminated.

We cannot and should not confine our products and our industries within the limitations of unscalable tariff walls. We cannot isolate ourselves today economically any more than we can do so militarily. Economic isolation is a thing of the past and I hope will never again be revived. We need markets for our surplus foods and goods. Unless this surplus is made salable in foreign countries, it means an excess at home that will eventually mean overstocked food supplies and excess inventories that will eventually lead to the ruin of the farmer, the bankruptcy of our industries, and the unemployment of our workers.

New markets mean more avenues over which our surplus may be shipped to the benefit of business and agriculture in the United States. This bill will help keep our foreign markets open to us until at least June 12, 1951, when the Congress will take another look at the world picture and determine whether we shall again extend the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

I recall in 1945 when our Republican colleagues were agreeable to the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act for a period of 1 year. It seemed to me that if reciprocal trade agreements are correct in principle, then our colleagues of the minority should cease, each time the act comes up for extension, their obstructive tactics.

We are asking today for the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act in virtually the same way we advocated in 1945; in fact, we are advocating the continuance of the scientific approach to the whole tariff question established in 1934 and its successful and unhampered operation, until the 1948 extension forced through the Congress by the Republican majority.

Our distinguished ranking minority Member has called attention to the fact that there are 800,000 farmers who are members of granges and he concludes that they are opposed to this legislation. Let me suggest to my distinguished friend that the results of the 1948 elections in the agricultural States give little support to the contention that the farmers are opposed to the Democratic concept of reciprocal trade agreements.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, so much has been said in the minority report and by Members of the minority speaking on H. R. 1211 that it is difficult for one in support of the legislation to decide just where to begin in arguing its merits. For some time I have been very seriously concerned with the charges which my good friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] has made. As I recall the first time he made that statement was on May 21, 1947, in connection with the introduction of a resolution creating a select committee to investigate the loyalty of certain associates and advisers to the Under Secretary of State for many years. The gentleman today stated that he has upon a reliable basis information that some nine individuals out of approximately 101 who attended the Geneva Convention in 1947 were either Communists or Communist fellow travelers. I have asked the gentleman, and I think it is his duty, to report such information as he has and the source of that information to those people in the State Department who are charged with the responsibility of conducting these loyalty tests. It is my understanding that every man who attended the Geneva Convention from all of the departments representing our Government, as the result perhaps of the original charge of the gentleman from New York, has been very, very carefully screened, not only by the heads of the departments employing those individuals but by the FBI itself.

I have a letter addressed to me, dated February 3, 1949, from Mr. John A. Peurifoy, one of the Assistant Secretaries in the State Department, which I shall include as a part of my remarks, and I hope and trust the gentleman will read it in the RECORD.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 3, 1949.

The Honorable WILBUR D. MILLS,
Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MILLS: I understand that Mr. Charles Davis, clerk of the House Committee on Ways and Means, has requested the Department for a statement in connection with a question pertaining to the loyalty or security of certain members of the United States delegation to the International Conference on Trade and Employment held in Geneva, Switzerland, in 1947.

When this matter was originally brought to my attention, I requested the Division of Security to recheck the files of all officers and employees of the Department who attended that Conference. This Division advises me that:

1. All officials or employees of the Department listed as attending that Conference have either been investigated by the Department or checked with the Federal Bureau of Investigation. In most instances they have been investigated by the Division of Security in addition to being checked with the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

2. In no case has information come to the attention of the Division of Security either from the Federal Bureau of Investigation or other sources which would support the conclusion that any such person is either disloyal or a security risk.

I have also requested and received from the Secretaries (or other responsible officials) of the Departments of War, Navy, Treasury, Commerce, Interior, Agriculture, Labor, and the United States Tariff Commission, certificates or other written assurances as to the loyalty of their delegates to this Conference.

Needless to say, if any member of the committee will advise me of the nature of any derogatory information relating to any official or employee of this Department, I will personally undertake to see that the matter is thoroughly and completely investigated.

I shall be happy to make available to you any further information which may be of use to you in connection with this matter.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN E. PEURIFOY,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. I may say to the gentleman that I will include a letter from Mr. Hoover himself that the gentleman may read.

Mr. MILLS. I will be glad to do so, but I want him to put in the RECORD the names of the individuals, if the gentleman knows that there are Communists in the State Department. I believe it to be his duty in upholding the Constitution of the United States to divulge those names.

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman can get that information from the executive department if he wishes to have it.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman did not get it from the executive department. The gentleman said he got it from the FBI. If he did, why does he not make that information available, not only to us but to those in the departments of Government that employ these individuals? The gentleman knows he voted for legislation establishing the President's authority to conduct loyalty investigations. He did that. Now, if he has this type of information, I beseech him to give it to those departments that are charged with the responsibility of employing these people; otherwise I must assume the gentleman injects this argument in connection with reciprocal trade agreements because he and his colleagues have run out of valid objections to the program.

Mr. REED of New York. I may say to the gentleman that when you get a lead on these people and you give out their names it interferes with the operations of the FBI and the gentleman knows that.

Mr. MILLS. Well, the gentleman mentioned the name of a Mr. Wadleigh. The gentleman also mentioned the name of a Mr. Perlo.

Mr. REED of New York. I got those from the Committee on Un-American Activities.

Mr. MILLS. In what connection did they serve the trade-agreements program?

Mr. REED of New York. That was put in the RECORD today.

Mr. MILLS. Have they ever in any capacity been connected with the reciprocal trade-agreements program?

Mr. REED of New York. The RECORD shows the facts and I put them in and the gentleman knows it. It is in the RECORD for the gentleman to read and for all the world to read.

Mr. MILLS. I am asking the gentleman, in anticipation of my reading it, whether or not they have ever had anything to do with the reciprocal trade-agreements program?

Mr. REED of New York. Read the RECORD and the gentleman will see it.

Mr. MILLS. Were they at Geneva in 1947?

Mr. REED of New York. Oh, perhaps not, but they were the legal advisers of the people who were helping write the trade-agreements program and knew all the details.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman put in the RECORD in connection with his remarks when these gentlemen were employed and in what capacity they served?

Mr. REED of New York. It is in the RECORD. They were read into the RECORD and the gentleman heard it.

Mr. MILLS. I did not hear it.

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman should have been here.

Mr. MILLS. I was on the floor but I did not hear the gentleman say that these gentlemen had anything whatsoever to do with this program.

Mr. REED of New York. I tell the gentleman that it is in the RECORD.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. The statement that was read on the floor, and I paid careful attention to it, was that these men named in their own testimony before the Senate committee stated that they had things to do with these reciprocal trade agreements.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman said that themselves?

Mr. MASON. Yes. They themselves said it in testimony before the Senate committee.

Mr. MILLS. Does my friend, the gentleman from Illinois, know whether they are now employed with the Department of State or not?

Mr. MASON. I do not.

Mr. MILLS. Well, it has come to my attention that they are not and have not been since 1944, and that the gentleman that they complain about the most was not even in the Department when the Swiss agreement was negotiated in 1935. They were not at the Geneva Conference in 1947 and had nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. It appears to me that some on the opposition side to this measure have come to the conclusion that they should oppose the measure because perhaps some fellow travelers are in favor of it. That is about the argument they are using.

Mr. MILLS. Of course, they know and you know and I know that there is no program that has been conceived by our Government to which the Communists in Russia or in the United States so vociferously object as the European recovery program and the reciprocal trade agreements program. Now, is there any argument about that? The Russian Government did everything that they could do to prevent the success of the Geneva Conference.

Does the gentleman from New York know whether or not these nine men he complains of participated in the movement to scuttle the Geneva Conference?

Mr. REED of New York. I do not know a thing about that, but I know exactly what this record shows here, which I read, and if the gentleman will yield time to me I will read it to him again.

Mr. MILLS. I am just as much concerned about this situation as the gentleman from New York is.

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman seems to be very much concerned.

Mr. MILLS. Because of this: I cannot understand my friend's reluctance in divulging these names. If I had them, I would give them up to the State Department, or whoever employed them.

Mr. REED of New York. You cannot divulge the names of individuals when the FBI is following leads in its investigation. That has been the rule of the Government for a long time.

Mr. MILLS. How in the world did the FBI divulge the names to the gentleman then, if that is the rule it follows?

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. This charge has been made several times in the past; is that not a fact?

Mr. MILLS. Oh, yes; it has been made in the past.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. I have been informed that the State Department sent a representative to the office of the gentleman from New York and asked to get these names.

Mr. MILLS. A gentleman by the name of Wilson, so I am informed.

Mr. REED of New York. That I do not deny, sir.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman did not give the names to him, however.

Mr. REED of New York. Why should I give them out when they were making an investigation? Not at all.

Mr. MILLS. But the gentleman did not give the names to this State Department representative, did he?

Mr. REED of New York. I did not.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. PHILBIN. Why did they not go to the FBI and get the names?

Mr. MILLS. They have canvassed with the FBI just as much as the gentleman would if he were the head of the Department. They have been screened. The State Department has asked that everyone of them be investigated. I am not trying to defend anybody who is a Communist or fellow traveler, but what I want to know is why, at this late hour, when Mr. Perlo had something to do with the trade-agreements program from 1936 for a while—why at this late hour, when they have run out of arguments, just to find opposition to this program, the allegation of Communists among the administrative personnel now has to be injected.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. I do not know why the gentleman would want to bring the name of Wilson into this discussion. I know nothing about any of it. But, if Mr. Wilson wanted to find out, he is a representative of the State Department, as I understand.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Wilson has talked to the FBI about every one of these people, and he did not receive the information that the gentleman from New York says he has received.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman did not let me finish my question. Why did not Mr. Wilson, if he is an attaché of the State Department, talk to the FBI and find it out himself?

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman has made a very diligent effort to do that but he did not receive this information. I hope the gentleman from New York will help us in our effort to ferret out these communists, and not keep these names to himself when matters like this come to his attention. I am interested in seeing all of them dismissed, and I know my friend from New York is. The easiest way to do it is to let the folks who employ them know the facts such as he has at his disposal.

I have read the report which has been filed by the minority members of the committee. I have attempted to analyze this report as best I can. I have even called on some of the minority members to advise me as to what they had in mind, and they have been nice enough to tell me what they did have in mind. I shall read the first paragraph of the report:

> We of the Republican minority of the Committee on Ways and Means are opposed to H. R. 1211 for the reason that H. R. 1211 repeals, rather than extends, the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948, thereby eliminating the existing procedural safeguards to domestic producers and to our national security in the conduct of the trade-agreements program.

The Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948 makes no special provision for safeguards to national security; in fact, it does not even make reference to national security. The Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948 simply directs the Tariff Commission to determine the lowest tariff rates that can be established without causing serious injury or threat of injury to domestic industries, without regard to whether the industries are essential to national security or, for that matter, without regard to any other consideration. Even if the Tariff Commission were of the view that our national security dictated the lowest possible duties on imports of those strategic and critical materials which we have not produced in adequate volume—the Tariff Commission would still be obliged, under the present law, to be governed solely by considerations of injury or threat of injury to individual industries. Of course, the President is not legally prevented under the present law from disregarding the Tariff Commission's findings, but if he elected to do so, he would be placed on the defensive and would be forced to explain to the Congress the reasons for his nonobservance of the Commission's findings.

I wish the Members who signed that report would advise me in what particulars the 1948 act accomplishes that purpose of safeguarding the domestic producers and our national security.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Under the 1948 act, the Tariff Commission would find what we term a peril point, a point below which a cut in the tariff would endanger or seriously damage an American industry. The President in preparing his trade agreements thereafter would not be bound to follow that recommendation. He could if he saw fit cut below that recommendation, and thereafter the President would have to report to the public, to the Congress, that he had cut below the level recommended by the Tariff Commission. That information would be available to the industry and would show the industry just what this administration saw fit to do, if the President by any presumed carelessness would cut the tariff below the recommended amount. That would provide a protection to the American industry.

Mr. MILLS. To the American industry, but would it provide any protection to our American economy, or would it provide any protection to our national security?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. The American industry and American economy are more or less synonymous.

Mr. MILLS. I understand from the gentleman's point of view they are, but American industry is only one segment of our American economy, of course. If the present law actually required the Tariff Commission to relate its findings to what would be perilous to our domestic economy, it would be a far better law than it is. The Commission would then have to take into account such considerations as national security, the interests of the domestic consumer, and the cost to the Federal Treasury. But under the present law, the Tariff Commission must relate its findings solely to what would be perilous to individual industries. The interests of individual industries are not at all synonymous with the interests of our domestic economy.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman asked me two questions. With respect to national security, that information would be available to the public, and public opinion would rise up against any individual who would flout a recommendation of the Tariff Commission. I call to the gentleman's attention the matter of watches in this country.

Mr. MILLS. Yes; I want to discuss watches, if the gentleman will permit me, a little later. But the Tariff Commission is not instructed to report with regard to national defense.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. With respect to national defense, they are strategic and essential. Certainly if the tariff is to be cut to their harm, the American public should know it.

Mr. MILLS. Let me reason with the gentleman a few minutes, if I may. He insists upon the retention within the 1948 act of the authority of the Tariff Commission, acting as a commission, to determine peril points.

The premise on which the amendment is offered is that the peril-point procedure contained in the present act can achieve the objectives claimed. Under present law the Commission is considering 400 items. The Commission is allowed only 120 calendar days in which to establish peril points, which means that if the Commission devoted every day of the week, and had nothing else to do, it would have to cover these items at the rate of over three a day. This is manifestly impossible if the Commission is to arrive at judgments which could be useful. In ordinary investigations, the Commission would seldom determine a rate for a single item in less than a month or two, and on occasions has taken over a year or more. The Congress cannot both require that the Commission shall make a scientific study of an indeterminate number of items and report in an interval of 120 days. Moreover, and perhaps a more serious objection, is that the whole concept of a peril-point is misweighed. The Commission is in effect asked to isolate just one of the many factors, and often one of the less important, which bear on the economic prosperity of a domestic industry. We deny that an industry which is protected from imports is automatically assured of prosperity.

Moreover, what constitutes a peril point? Any industry which has competition from imports has in it some "weak sisters." Marginal producers are those most vulnerable to competition, and there is never a time when an industry is receiving competition from imports that a reduction in duty does not hit someone. The question is, How far down the line do you want to go—what are criteria of serious injury? A peril point for a single industry may not be such for all other like competing industries but they will attempt to use it to obtain greater protection than they had ever before thought necessary.

The whole concept is one injected for the purpose of sabotaging the trade-agreements program, and the best evidence is that it is advocated and introduced by those who had always voted against renewal of the act. The fact that in response to public pressure they found they had to endorse continuation of some sort of trade-agreements program tempted them to inject into that program a lethal measure, and this is it. The Tariff Commission, as such, has never passed on the wisdom of the peril-point procedure, as evidenced in the Commissioner's testimony before the Senate last year. Commissioner Ryder's views are no different now than when he appeared and testified before the Senate in 1948, as follows:

> I doubt the advisability of transforming the Commission into a policy-making agency and thus subjecting it more than in the past to political vicissitudes. The attempt to determine the degree to which duties may be reduced without injury to domestic producers or impairment of the national defense would require the making of such difficult and fundamental judgments that the Commission would in effect be making major policy decisions.
> The element of judgment, of course, enters into the various phases of the Commission's present work. This is especially true of the duties which have been assigned to it under the escape clause in trade agreements. In cases under that clause, however, its findings as to whether serious injury to domestic industry has occurred or is threatened will be based on actual observation of the imports after the trade-agreement concession has come into force.
> In contrast, the findings required under H. R. 6556 would have to be based to a large extent, especially under present abnormal conditions, on assumptions and estimates as to future probabilities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten additional minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MILLS. I want to know whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania and his colleagues want a scientific study of the Tariff Commission, or a snap judgment.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman implies that the Tariff Commission cannot do the job. The Tariff Commission was given the burden in the 1948 act. They have never complained nor said they would not do it. The assumption is that they will carry out the law, and the gentleman and the members on this side of the committee refused to invite members of the Tariff Commission to come before us so that we could ask them, and they could tell us, whether or not they could carry out the law.

Mr. MILLS. I can assure the gentlemen that we were not calling for the press, when the gentleman and his colleagues last year refused to let the press in. The gentleman, I am sure, realizes fully that the Tariff Commission in the past has spent as much as a year in attempting to determine the effect of imports upon a single item. I do not believe that the information that the 200 people employed by the Tariff Commission have, enables the Tariff Commission to advise the President within a period of 120 days of the effect of any import on any commodity about which there may be some doubt in the minds of anyone.

Oh, yes, you say it is nice to have this information given to the President. You say it is going to be in confidence, and that the Tariff Commission is acting to serve the President, so that when these individuals who negotiate these agreements come to him with the work done, he can put that alongside of the work done by the Tariff Commission and decide whether or not he will approve the agreement. It would not be so bad if a scientific study could be made, and if the President could really receive helpful information. The danger of it is this, and I wonder if the gentleman has considered this factor. The gentleman and I have been in Washington long enough to know that very, very seldom does a report or a statement of findings made by a department of the Government to the President fail to leak out. If it is going to leak out and if the Tariff Commission, on the basis of snap judgment, establishes a point below which it is dangerous to the industry, then to whom is this information going to leak? It is going to leak to the industry that is interested, and to the producer who is interested, and who wants that information. In what position, then, does that put the Tariff Commission? May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in the event that this producer should come to the Tariff Commission at some subsequent date under section 336 or 332 and ask for an investigation or study of injury to him, would not the Tariff Commission already have committed itself?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly if the industry knew that those making the agreement were willing to sell his industry out by cutting below the peril point, that industry should come before the Congress and complain and undertake to safeguard it.

But may I ask the gentleman this question: Is it, or is it not, a fact that scientific study is made today before the cuts are made in tariffs?

Mr. MILLS. Not under the 1948 act.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Well, I mean in the past.

Mr. MILLS. Under the old law, yes. So far as the law in effect prior to the act of 1948, the gentleman is correct. The Tariff Commission could do this job in all probability if the gentleman would permit them sufficient time. But the gentleman wants them to establish a peril point on 400 items in 120 days at the rate of less than 3 hours per item. I would like to know how many employees the Tariff Commission would have to have in the gentleman's opinion in order for any of them or all of them to think that fast.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I do not know, and I do not care. But I do say the industry should be heard.

Mr. MILLS. Is this not the gentleman's concern—that it is not possible for industry to be fully advised during the course of negotiations as to the cuts that may be in prospect for that industry? I think that is the concern of the gentleman and those who oppose a continuation of the old law. Does the gentleman realize that there is not one individual who sits on a trade agreements committee who can tell me or anyone else how much of a cut will be made in any tariff affecting any item until the negotiation has occurred? You say nobody knows how they have been received before the committees on reciprocity information. Nobody knows what impression he has made. Yes, they do. If there has been no reduction in the tariff affecting them, if there has been a very moderate reduction in the tariff, if the committee has not gone below the levels which the industry pointed out, is it not logical to assume that their arguments were considered? Certainly they were considered. The gentleman knows that.

If the gentleman had a valid position I would be perfectly frank. If it were practicable to establish a scientific peril point I cannot see any harm in it. But I do not want the President of the United States to be bound, in negotiating these agreements, on the basis of anybody's snap judgment. But now let us consider the second amendment relating to the escape clause. The gentleman's argument for an escape clause, which will be made tomorrow, I am sure will sound very plausible. Well, here we are. The administration has declared it to be the policy, and it has been the practice since 1942, to insert escape clauses in every negotiation under this act. Some trade agreements negotiated a few years ago did not contain escape clauses. It was thought very wise by the Congress earlier to include section 332, so that, in the event an industry could actually show threat of injury or existing injury, it might have an opportunity to go before the Tariff Commission, the whole body, acting officially, and if it made a case, the Commission had the responsibility under the law—and they have it now—of making that fact known to the President of the United States, and he can terminate, modify by agreement or otherwise, everything that is in any reciprocal trade agreement.

What is the purpose of the Annecy meeting in France in April? The purpose of that meeting is to negotiate with 13 countries, 8 of which we already have agreements. If there are any new agreements arrived at at Annecy, every one of those agreements will have an escape clause. There will be some 10 agreements left without escape clauses. Now, what is the purpose that the gentleman expects to accomplish by a directive from the Congress that an escape clause be included in these agreements, when it is already the policy of the administration to include an escape clause in every one of them, and efforts will be made in the future to include such a clause in those that do not now have it? The only way in which such a clause could be included in these agreements is by negotiations; it cannot be done by congressional legislation. The United States cannot unilaterally insert such a clause in agreements which do not contain them. This recommendation therefore amounts to a request for the renegotiation of a number of trade agreements including the Swiss trade agreement. It is doubtful that such action is warranted at this time inasmuch as the United States is already in the process of renegotiating the outstanding trade agreements which do not contain an escape clause; all new agreements must, of course, incorporate such a clause.

Furthermore, if the executive is required to obtain the consent of these 10 countries to the insertion of the clause in our agreement with them, even without a rigid time schedule, a situation might easily come about in which the only alternative would be to denounce the agreement, thereby losing valuable concessions for United States exporters. Continuation of the present course of renegotiations on an over-all basis appears in general to be the most feasible procedure.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. After the Annecy agreement in April, there will be more discrimination than there is today, because certain nations, notably Switzerland, will not have any escape clause, which we propose to require.

Mr. MILLS. I am sure the gentleman is thinking in terms of the great hardship that has come to the Waltham Watch Co. That company did not have any great success in years past under a protective tariff. It has not gone any deeper in the red under the reciprocal trade-agreements program. The gentleman knows the testimony before the committee by a gentleman representing the Gruen Watch Co., to the effect that he tried to buy Waltham Watch Co. plant but only on terms, which were turned down, that he could modernize the antiquated plant. What is he doing? He is going out to Cincinnati and putting in a new plant out there, lock, stock, and barrel. If only imports were hurting Waltham, would the Gruen Watch Co. manufacture its own parts in the United States?

The minority report, on page 5, asserts:

> Alarming evidence was presented to the committee, showing that several of our industries which manufactured vital military equipment in World War II are in a critical condition as a direct reason of tariff concessions. The most publicized, but by no means the only example, is that of the jeweled-watch industry. The importance of this industry to our national defense is shown by the following letter from Lieutenant General Lutes.

I do not find that Lieutenant General Lutes' letter at all substantiates the charges made by the minority. The letter reports some employment data based on information supplied by Mr. Generazzo, an independent labor organizer who now represents the employees of three domestic companies. Lieutenant General Lutes' letter states further that the skilled manpower of the watch and clock industry is highly important to our National Military Establishment and that—

> The maintenance of at least a minimum level of operation by the American jeweled-watch industry is vital to the defense of the United States and should be preserved.

I am not aware that any member of the majority has expressed a contrary opinion. Actually there is no dispute about this point at all. Lieutenant General Lutes does not say that there is any need to limit imports of Swiss watches or that the present domestic watch and clock industry is inadequate to meet the needs of our military services in the event of a national emergency. So far as I have been able to ascertain, neither Lieutenant General Lutes nor any other officer of the military services has ever officially advocated any restriction whatsoever of imports of Swiss watches. I respectfully invite the minority members to submit any evidence to the contrary.

The current controversy about the watch industry centers principally about bankruptcy of the Waltham Co. and the efforts of that company to reorganize on the basis of loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and from others, including employees of the Waltham Co. The evidence submitted to the Ways and Means Committee at our hearings which ended last week indicates clearly that the Waltham Co. failed, not because of excessive competition from Switches, but primarily because of the inefficiency and incompetence of its management and the obsolescence of its plant. Three other American companies that also make wholly domestic watches have been able to sell profitably all of the watches they have been able to make; and a fourth American company, which now imports all its watch movements, is in process of building a plant to manufacture movements in the United States. If competition from Switzerland were so foreboding, why would the Waltham Co. alone go bankrupt? And why would Elgin, Hamilton, and the domestic Bulova plant make such handsome profits? And why would a leading importer of Swiss movements erect a watch movement plant in this country at this time?

I should like to clarify one other matter. In recognizing that the watch industry is essential to our national defense, we do not want to lose sight of the fact that it is not the only such industry. There are hundreds of others. Undoubtedly we could have used during the last war many more persons with watchmaking skills, but we could also have used many more mechanics, opticians, doctors, aviators—and soldiers—and for that matter, many more janitors, street cleaners, handymen, and housemaids. The fact is, we were so much shorter of persons who knew how to make electric meters—and many other articles needed by the military—than we were of watchmakers, that our military had our watch industry manufacture many articles that it was no better equipped to produce than the manufacturers of electrical instruments, camera equipment, typewriters, and toy trains. If the situation had been just the opposite, that is, if electric meter makers, for example, had been obliged to turn to making watches, there might then be a concern about a possible shortage of watchmakers in a future emergency. Actually the domestic watch- and clock-making facilities in this country are now at an all-time high. The plants devoted to making these articles are still in process of enlargement and modernization, and thousands of GI's as well as others, have been trained in watchmaking skills since World War II.

I submit, Mr. Chairman that the reason the complaining domestic watch producers have not received relief from Swiss imports that they have not been injured by them, and not because the Swiss trade agreement lacks an escape clause. If the domestic watch industry were in fact being jeopardized by imports from Switzerland, I am confident that our military services would so advise and that the State Department or the Tariff Commission would take appropriate action. If need be, the Swiss trade agreement could even be terminated.

Only a short time ago the Tariff Commission made a thorough study of the watch industry at the request of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House and the Committee on Finance of the Senate. Its report is almost 200 printed pages. Nothing that appears in that report and nothing that has transpired since that report was written indicates—so far as I am aware—the need for the kind of restrictive action advocated by the three domestic complainants and Mr. Cenerazzo.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I think we have witnessed the greatest display of deep concern for the Communists. I brought the subject into this debate here today so that you people would not go blindly into this question of turning everything over to the State Department to be run and handled, because as I pointed out in my speech we have a hundred critical industries in this country producing critical materials for war, and we are building up these types of industries all the time in this country as far as we can. These are vital to the defense of this country; they must not be traded away. As I pointed out today the purpose of the peril point is to see that they are not traded away under any circumstances. The greatest fact-finding commission we have in this Government is the Tariff Commission. Everybody knows it, every department of the Government turns to it, but not once during the existence of these trade agreements—and my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] said, the Tariff Commission had taken part in the making of these trade agreements. They have had individuals that sat in on these agreements, but as a commission it is never called on for findings on these peril points. That is a matter of record that cannot be disputed, because the record shows that never has the Tariff Commission as such been asked for its report on peril points.

Now, for the benefit of my friend from Arkansas who has become very excited in regard to the Communists: He wants nothing disclosed; he wants to stop all further investigations in regard to Communists in the State Department, and it is to be essential always that the names should not be disclosed. But here we have a report from a department that has investigated, a committee created by this Congress to aid them in knowing something about the Communist infiltration into this Government. I want to read from the report of the Committee on Un-American Activities, what they had to say. Here is their report on Victor Perlo:

VICTOR PERLO

Testimony of Victor Perlo, August 9, 1948: "I think I was officially an alternate member on the Committee for Reciprocity Information and the Trade Agreements Committee, which were identical or substantially identical in membership. These were interdepartmental committees which took care of all of the technical work in the preparation of trade agreements under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act and also to a certain extent a lot of preparatory work for the International Trade Organization."

On the same day, Miss Elizabeth Terrill Bentley, a former member of the Communist espionage ring, confronted Mr. Perlo and identified him as a member of this ring while she was active. When questioned on these charges Mr. Perlo refused to answer charging that his rights under the first and fifth amendments were being violated and that such answer "might tend to incriminate or degrade me." Perlo was also identified as a member of this ring by Whittaker Chambers on August 3, 1948.

Then we have this report from the Committee on Un-American Activities on Henry J. Wadleigh:

HENRY J. WADLEIGH

Testimony of Henry J. Wadleigh, December 9, 1948: "I was in the Division of Trade Agreements from 1936, until the war in Europe broke out * * * (superiors were) Henry Grade in the Trade Agreements Division, then Harry Hawkins, then Leo Pasvolsky, special assistant to the Secretary of State, and in Italy, Henry Grade * * * Mr. (Francis B.) Sayre was Assistant Secretary in charge of the Trade Agreements Division when I first was employed there. Mr. Acheson later took Mr. Sayre's place."

On December 6, 1948, in an executive meeting of the Committee on Un-American Activities, Whittaker Chambers identified Julian Wadleigh (Henry Julian Wadleigh) as a scurce from which the former received documents for transmission to representatives of the Soviet military intelligence. When questioned by the Committee on Un-American Activities on December 9, 1948, Mr. Wadleigh refused to answer all questions dealing with such activity on the ground that such testimony might tend to incriminate him. Mr. Wadleigh has since been a witness before a Federal grand jury in New York and it is our understanding that he has been a cooperative witness.

Another is Alger Hiss. They had this to say:

ALGER HISS

On December 23, 1943, Mr. Francis B. Sayre, former Assistant Secretary of State, who was in charge of the Department's Division of Trade Agreements, testified that on April 28, 1936, he recommended that Alger Hiss be appointed as his assistant in the Department of Trade Agreements. He further testified that Mr. Hiss' duties included the legal prepation of trade agreements. Hiss was transferred to another division of the State Department on January 16, 1942.

You will recall that Mr. Charles Taft in testifying stated he was not employed in the State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself two additional minutes.

Continuing:

Attached herewith is the second report of the Committee on Un-American Activities on Soviet espionage within the United States Government.

A study of this report which contains facsimiles of State Department documents emanating from the Department of Trade Agreements and, according to Mr. Chambers, furnished to him by Alger Hiss and Julian Wadleigh for transmission to the Soviet military intelligence agent, will disclose to some extent the proportions of this leakage of information.

Alger Hiss is now under indictment by a Federal grand jury in New York for perjury.

If the gentleman from Arkansas is so concerned about these Communists and feels nothing should be said on the floor when they have had parts in this transaction why, then, I have nothing more to say. He seems to be wanting to defend these people, he seems to want to criticize me for bringing this to the attention of a group of citizens who are entitled to the facts.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLS. The criticism of the gentleman, if I have any criticism of my beloved friend, is the fact he does not name nine men so that they can be fired from the State Department like all of these individuals he has just read have been.

Mr. REED of New York. I am not at all questioning the patriotism of the gentleman from Arkansas but he knows as well as I do and as every Member of this House knows, that you cannot interrupt an investigation that is going on, and I have been told that often, when I have asked for certain investigations to be made. They do not disclose anything until the investigation is complete. I am telling you that investigation is going on now. It should continue until all the facts are disclosed and before we continue this reciprocal-trade-agreements program.

Mr. MILLS. I hope they get them all.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me say to the gentleman from New York that this spy ring was operating during the war, passing out these secret documents to our enemies at a time when our boys were dying by the thousands on the battlefields of Europe.

Mr. REED of New York. Undoubtedly thousands of our boys were killed as a result of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, during the course of the hearings on this bill I asked a representative of the State Department to name the foreign countries that have been helped by the reciprocal trade agreements, to list the countries and then for each country that was helped to list the industries that were specifically assisted, also the number of people that were restored to the pay roll in that industry. I did not get the information. I wish that someone on the majority side, if he has the facts and figures showing that any foreign nation has been helped by this program and can prove it with proper statistics, would put them in the RECORD so that we will have them tomorrow.

A great deal has been said about the evils of the old method of writing tariff legislation. We have heard a great deal about log-rolling tariff bills. It is my honest opinion, Mr. Chairman, that the action of the majority, the partisan position they have taken in regard to this matter, will do more to return this country to log-rolling tariff acts than anything that has been done in a generation.

Their determination to repeal the 1948 act and their refusal to call the Tariff Commission and the military department to testify were unjustified.

The Eightieth Congress extended the Trade Agreements Act. They attempted to try to throw around it some rules and some safeguards. Many of us believe in genuine reciprocity. We want some of that so-called Yankee trading. It would be foolish to say that the old tariff days were without fault and without evil. No one is arguing to go back. We want to go forward. If certain amendments are added I will support this measure.

The State Department should clean house with respect to the men connected with the trade agreements. Take this man Alger Hiss. The gentleman from New York made reference to his activity in regard to trade agreements. In the fall of 1945 in this Hall I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement asking the State Department to have the FBI investigate Alger Hiss and make that record known. It was not done. The statement of the gentleman from New York that Mr. Clayton journeyed to Switzerland to negotiate trade agreements and took nine Communists with him was not challenged in the committee. The State Department never denied it. Now, if there is anything in the world that the Communists want it is a depression in America and a weakening of our national defense. That can happen under the present system. You can call it a red herring if you want to.

I want to call as my witness the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], who on January 25 stated on this floor:

> Mr. Speaker, over this week end we have learned the extent of the disaster that has befallen China and the United States. The responsibility for the failure of our foreign policy in the Far East rests squarely with the White House and the Department of State. The continued insistence that aid would not be forthcoming unless a coalition government with the Communists was formed, was a crippling blow to the National Government.

Now, that is the crowd that is going to write your tariff law. That is the crowd that is going to determine the future of industries in this country that are so vital to our welfare. That is the group that is going to write the tax law that means the life or death over industries essential to our national defense.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS. I cannot yield right now. When I finish I shall be glad to yield.

Again, I say, the State Department in the hearings never denied that they took nine Communists and fellow travelers to Geneva to help plan world trade. It is quite evident that they took them to San Francisco. Anyone who reads Mr. Hiss' record knows that.

I would like to see this legislation amended so that I can support it. I would like to see an escape clause. The peril-point procedure should be retained. I would like to see some safeguards thrown around this law so that the national defense of this Republic could not be bartered away by men who either do not know or do not care.

I was one of those people who had hoped that we would have here in America following the war a growing, expanding synthetic rubber industry. We could have lost the last war if it had not been for the great strides we made in synthetic rubber production. That industry is very essential to our national defense. What has the State Department done in regard to it? Among other things, they have frozen rubber on the free list. We cannot impose a tariff against natural and synthetic rubber without violating our agreements. And that is not all. At the present time we are maintaining a synthetic rubber industry through the power that this Congress delegated to the President to issue directives requiring a certain percentage of our rubber to be synthetic. The State Department bound this country not to increase that formula in favor of synthetic rubber production. Did they ask Congress about it? Did they come to the Committee on Armed Services? No, they did not.

It was not so many months ago that the chief champion for trade agreements that came before our committee was none other than Henry Wallace. About the last official functions of Alger Hiss were in connection with trade agreements. Again, I remind you that Mr. REED's charges were never denied by the State Department.

Now I want to say something about this great American watch industry of ours. Where would we be in America if we did not have that pool of trained workers, those experts whom it takes at least 10 years to develop, some of them, to make the timing instruments, these precision instruments so necessary to make machines of war? Our own Military Establishment sent up a letter stating that the maintenance of the watch industry is necessary for the national defense.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to call attention to a portion of the testimony of Mr. James G. Shennan which is found in the hearings:

> The 1936 trade agreement with Switzerland reduced the tariffs on watches, and thereafter the American industry's share in the American market fell sharply. Subsequent to the 1936 trade agreement, four factors, in addition to the reduction of tariffs, operated to reduce further the tariff protection which remained to the industry.
> First, in 1934, the United States reduced the value of the dollar. This is one of the reasons given in the Tariff Commission's digest of trade data on the trade agreement with Switzerland, for reducing watch tariffs by the Swiss trade agreement in 1936. Four months after consummation of the agreement, the Swiss devalued the franc by approximately 35 percent, but no compensating increase was thereafter made in the reduced tariffs.
> Two, the tariff duties on watches are specific, that is to say so many dollars and cents per watch. The subsequent inflation has operated to reduce further, on an ad valorem or percentage basis, the protection left by the trade agreement and the devaluation of the Swiss franc.
> Three, the duty on "adjustments," which was intended to afford progressively greater protection the higher the quality of the watch, has been rendered completely ineffective by the marking of imported watches as "unadjusted," regardless of the fact.
> Four, the cost of watch-movement manufacture, which is practically all labor, has more than doubled in this country since the beginning of the war.
> The dollar increase here has been disproportionate to that in Switzerland, inasmuch as we started from a higher base cost because of the much higher labor rates in this country. Our labor rates are approximately 2½ times those of the Swiss for comparable jobs.
> Over 55,000,000 jeweled watches and movements have been imported into this country since 1941; the high point being 1946 when imports of jeweled watches exceeded the 9,000,000 mark.
> During the first 11 months of 1948, the latest statistics available to us, the imports of jeweled watches exceeded 7,100,000. This is an average of almost 7,000,000 jeweled watches annually over the years beginning with 1941, as contrasted to an average of about 2,600,000 from 1936 through 1940, and an average of less than 1,000,000 for the years 1930 through 1935.

All of these watches are advertised and sold as jeweled watches, and are competitive with the products of this industry.

Waltham has already felt the full impact of this competition, and any weakening of the watch market in this country could have serious repercussions on the remaining companies in the industry. The break-even point of the American watch industry has steadily risen, during the war and since, and this requires a larger volume to sustain profitable operations than ever before.

Price increases were granted to the importers of Swiss watches by OPA during the war, and their profits were not subject to renegotiation. This, and their continued heavy volume during our reconversion, has enabled the importers, during and since the war, to more extensively advertise their brand names than ever before.

In addition to this advertising of brand names by the importers, the Swiss watch manufacturers themselves, within the last year, for the first time, have gone into a tremendous institutional advertising campaign promoting the Swiss watch in this country in an effort to enhance the already dominant position they hold in this market.

The trade agreement with Switzerland has been in effect since 1936, 12 years next month. During this period inflation and other influences have operated on the specific duties of the watch tariffs to completely obsolete them. In addition, the war took the American industry completely out of the market, and imposed on the American industry a difficult reconversion problem.

It is our opinion that this agreement, when it was entered into 12 years ago, was not intended to create an inflexible situation. But the agreement has never been changed in that entire 12-year period. Furthermore, the agreement does not contain an escape clause, as do the more recently negotiated or renegotiated agreements, and as is now required by Executive order.

Mr. Shennan went on to say:

We have been told by the National Security Resources Board that they anticipate Switzerland will be completely cut off in the event of another war.

Additional tariff protection, designed to equalize the cost of movement production in this country and the cost of movements to the importers, is necessary to insure the future of this industry as a matter of national defense, if for no other reason.

A great many governments are attempting to reduce imports by quota or exchange restrictions. We are not asking this. Under the conditions that exist today we do not think this is the answer to the industry's problem.

The American jeweled-watch industry is not seeking an advantage in the American market. Gentlemen, we ask only for equality at the border of the United States; we ask for realistic duties which will equalize the cost of a movement to the importer with the cost of a comparable movement made in America by American labor. From this point on, the material, labor, and other services required are, and should be, on a competitive basis.

Correct these tariff inequities by giving us equality at the border. It will stimulate American-movement production. It will attract others to the business. It may well attract Swiss importers to set up factories here. This we would welcome. It would stimulate competition. And furthermore, it would strengthen the defenses of this Nation by preserving and enhancing the skills necessary for the production of precision time mechanisms.

Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of record that the Swiss watch industry sold their timing instruments to our enemies in the last war. Perhaps it will be said they were a neutral and had a right to do that. It must be borne in mind, however, that during that same time the American jeweled-watch industry went to war totally. Without it, we could not have attained victory. Since the war the Swiss have refused to ship watch-making machinery to the United States and have done everything they could to establish a world monopoly. I again want to call your attention to the testimony of Mr. Shennan.

Mr. CURTIS. What is the situation in regard to the past existence of an embargo on the export of watch-making machinery by the Swiss?

Mr. SHENNAN. The situation which arose in 1946 and still obtains is that we cannot buy any watch-making machinery from the machine builders in Switzerland except on a lease arrangement called machor, which has certain conditions in it that are very repugnant to the American theory of business which is to do the best you can and compete but not agree not to compete.

Mr. CURTIS. Is the Swiss watch industry pretty much of a controlled operation? How do they operate; do you know?

Mr. SHENNAN. Well, sir; it is rather complicated but in general there are several principal watch trusts that control and direct certain branches of the industry. There is one trust for watch manufacturers and one for parts, which includes the tool builders, one for the jewel makers and one for case makers. They are tied at the top by two organizations called the Superholding and also the Swiss Watch Chamber.

There is Government representation, or at least considerable interest, I am not too familiar with that. There is joint and central Government research, there is Government training of the engineers and tool makers, and in general I think that you can say that the trust, with Government blessings, controls everything they do.

That is a matter of public record, sir.

Mr. CURTIS. That interest of the Swiss Government continues on in their negotiation with foreign countries on watches?

Mr. SHENNAN. I would say they were very skillful negotiators.

Mr. CURTIS. Suppose the other two jeweled-watch industries in this country were to go the way of Waltham, and we hope that Waltham recovers, but in the event they do not, would that lead to pretty much of a world monopoly of the jeweled-watch industry?

Mr. SHENNAN. I would say that it would be virtually a complete world monopoly; yes, sir.

Mr. CURTIS. How long has it been since a new jeweled watch company was organized in the United States?

Mr. SHENNAN. A great many years. It has been a great many years since a new company was organized. However, the Bulova plant was started in 1931, if I am not mistaken, 1931 or 1932, and has been operating since that time.

Mr. CURTIS. That is carried on by a company that is also in the business of import, is that true?

Mr. SHENNAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CURTIS. In other words, your battle has been to hold your own without much hope of expansion, speaking for the industry generally?

Mr. SHENNAN. Yes, sir; that is true.

I might say this about the plant which is built by an importer. He may have the same reason to be worried about watch production as the United States Government. He may wish, therefore, to hedge his investment in his brand name by having some manufacturing on both sides of the ocean which I think is a reasonable sensible thing to do if you can afford to do it.

Mr. CURTIS. Now, if a more helpful climate could be created for the watch industry, that would have some degree of permanence and would not only protect the watch industry, that we have, but would make possible some expansion, would that be to the advantage of the American consumer and be of advantage to our Government from the standpoint of national defense?

Mr. SHENNAN. Yes, sir; I think it would. We do not believe in suppressing competition. I think in order to keep the industry on its toes, there must be a degree of competition but there comes a point when it is overwhelming. I do feel that if the industry had a chance to compete and grow, that eventually there would be benefits to both the consumer and to the national defense very definitely.

Mr. CURTIS. In other words, growth is a much better trend of things than mere maintenance of the status quo?

Mr. SHENNAN. I think if you stand still you very likely might go backward.

Mr. CURTIS. But from the standpoint of defense, we would not only be building up the factories and the machines to turn to but it would mean a new crop, a new-age group, of skilled workmen in more and new communities, would it not?

Mr. SHENNAN. That is the most important thing, as I see it, sir.

Testimony was submitted in our committee with reference to one particular type of watch movement that could be made in Switzerland, sent to this country, the reduced tariff paid on it, and the watch would still sell for $4.40 cheaper than it could be made here in America.

Some of these importers took the witness stand. I asked one of those gentlemen about his production costs. He said he did not know. He was the treasurer of a company manufacturing watches in Switzerland. I asked him about his wage rates. He said he did not know. Throughout the hearings, you will find question after question put in an effort to find out the facts, and they said they did not know.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. I do not have the current information, but not long ago we were receiving from 1 to 3 plane loads of watch parts per week from Switzerland, amounting to something between 5 and 10 tons of watch parts. Watch parts are very small and they make an awful lot of watches out of 10 tons of parts.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the gentleman.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. The latest information on the importation of Swiss watches is that they are coming in now at the rate of 9,000,000 watches a year.

Mr. CURTIS. I would like to have the attention of those Members who are interested in what the agricultural witnesses had to say. It has been said that the Farm Bureau favored this act. They did appear and speak generally in favor of trade agreements. I asked Mr. Kline:

Would you favor the reduction of tariffs on agricultural commodities in exchange for reduction of a foreign country of their tariffs on our industrial products?

Mr. KLINE. Well, the question taken just by itself, I would say "No."

I then asked:

In carrying out the trade-agreement program in the Western Hemisphere, does not that problem enter into it?

Mr. KLINE. Yes, sir.

I asked him:

Has the Farm Bureau any position with respect to further action by trade-agreement negotiators with respect to any one of the commodities such as butter, cheese, wheat, wool, and so on down the line?

Do you have any position with respect to any particular commodity?

Mr. KLINE. We have made here a statement of the general position, and within that position we reserve the right to take a look at things as they come along.

Mr. Goss, of the Grange, testified, and I want to give you a word or two from his statement. He said:

We do not believe H. R. 1211 will provide the type of tariff system the Nation needs.

Then he goes on to say:

In the Trade Agreements Act we made two basic changes—the abandonment of the principle of protection and surrendering the making of tariff rates to the executive branch of the Government.

First, we abandoned the protection policy and adopted a trade promotion policy. We adopted no rules to go by except to promote trade. We assumed that all trade is beneficial without regard to its effect on our producers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has again expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. CURTIS. May I also suggest that you examine the testimony submitted by the representative of the independent oil producers. That gentleman pointed out that concessions made allegedly to foreign countries were made to large oil companies, most of them being American companies, that the companies received the benefits, and they were not passed on to the country where this oil was produced.

A representative of the fruit and vegetable people from Florida gave to us the benefit of his own investigation in Mexico, he told how we reduced the tariff and an American company on the American side of the line produced those vegetables in Mexico and got the benefit of our tariff reduction and none of that benefit was passed along to the many Mexican people who did that work.

This act should be amended to prevent the growth of monopolies and trusts. Benefits intended for foreign workers should actually help them and not further exploit them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has again expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER].

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, I wish the membership would keep in mind that the minority report listed only two objections to the present measure. One objection was to the effect that the bill before us does not provide that every agreement shall immediately contain a so-called escape clause.

Now the true fact about the matter is that every agreement that has been entered into by this country since the year 1942 contains an escape clause and all future agreements will contain it. The State Department, the Interdepartmental Trade Agreements Committee, including the Department of Labor, the Department of Commerce, the National Military Establishment, and every other agency of the Federal Government concerned with the making of these agreements, have negotiated or are now negotiating, so that 18 out of 728 of our past agreements will contain this clause. The rest will be changed as soon as practicable.

Mr. Chairman, I wish the membership would also keep in mind that this act—this great Cordell Hull reciprocal-trade-agreements program—was first passed in 1934. It was renewed in 1937, renewed in 1940, renewed in 1943, and in 1945, and in 1948.

In other words, on six different occasions this question has been debated on the floor of the House and the floor of the Senate. We have gone through the agony in many instances of hearing the complaints of specific industries which were always afraid that they might be hurt. They always have the fear in their minds that the State Department and these other departments of the Government would negotiate concessions so that they would be put out of business; yet the record clearly discloses, Mr. Chairman, that in no single instance was any industry seriously hurt or damaged by any concession made under these reciprocal trade agreements. Every organization in the country that has, one might say, no special interest to plead is in favor of this great program.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the Members, now, to the fact that in 1934 the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee voted against this program, they voted solidly; they were against it; they were high protectionists; they were high-tariff people. In their minority report they listed 24 reasons why the act would practically ruin the American economy. But, mark you, Mr. Chairman, at that time they did not say the Communists were behind this. There was no "Beware, the Communists are behind it." On five different occasions this question has been debated on the floor of the House for days and days at a time and on the floor of the other body, yet never did they bring up this red herring. They bring it up today because all of the 24 reasons they had advanced in previous debates have been shown to carry no weight. They are throwing a lot of dead cats, if I may use that expression, Mr. Chairman, at the present renewal of this act in unrestricted and unhampered form. It was even charged in the hearings, Mr. Chairman, that these reciprocal trade agreements were largely responsible for the oil monopoly enjoyed throughout the world by five or six oil companies. It was even charged with failure because it had not prevented a Second World War. That was charged on the floor.

It was even charged in the committee hearings that the reciprocal trade agreements program was responsible for our not building up a sufficient stock pile of strategic materials; and on and on they go, trying to find excuses.

Why, they charged time and time again that the act was unconstitutional. That comes up at every hearing. The charge is made that the act is unconstitutional; and yet last year the Republican majority passed the act in practically the same form, insofar as constitutionality is concerned, as we passed it in 1945 and previous years, and as we are trying to pass it now.

Mr. Chairman, they pleaded last year in the hearings—in fact, it was pleaded here today—that we should return to the old logrolling days of the Smoot-Hawley tariff. They contended in previous debate on the floor that studies should be made of the difference in wages, studies which would probably take a couple of years to complete. They contend that we should obliterate the most-favored-nations clause.

Finally, we are down here today to the proposition that they have only two criticisms, each one of which evaporates after it is studied, by anyone not having a special interest to plead. So the only thing to do is to pass this bill as it has been presented to the House by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Last year the Republicans, of course, were in the majority, and it being an election year they were afraid to go before the great American voting public and say, "No; we are going to kill the reciprocal-trade-agreements program." But what did they say? They said, "We will renew it for 1 year." But then they hung so many dead weights around that program that it could not work. This is the testimony of those who were in charge of the operation of the program; and it was so stated by the President. The President has told us that the reciprocal trade program cannot be effectively and efficiently consummated because of the dead weights that were hung around it in 1948. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that had there been a different complexion of the House today the matter of the reciprocal-trade-agreements renewal would not be on the floor of this House, because the high protectionists, the high-tariff lobbyists and the high-tariff Members of Congress wanted to kill the program. They were afraid to kill it outright last year but they thought they could do it and fool the American public by hanging these dead weights around it.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. Why is it that the gentleman and his entire party, when they were in full power back in the heyday of the New Deal, never had the courage to extend it more than 3 years? Why did not the gentleman's party extend it and why do you not extend it now and make it permanent if it is so good? You have the votes, you have the power; why do you not do it?

Mr. EBERHARTER. When this great program was presented to the country and to the Congress of the United States,

Cordell Hull asked for a certain time. He thought it would be a good thing for the economy of the country, for the betterment of world conditions and he thought it would be a helpful aid to peace. He was of the opinion it should be tried for 3 years. So we just got into the habit of renewing it every 3 years in order to review it to see whether it is being properly administered. Every Congress since 1937, when the first act expired, has seen the wisdom of renewing it up until the Eightieth Republican Congress, at which time they thought they could kill the program, but, thank goodness, the wisdom of the American public is such that that scheme of theirs did not go through.

When the 1948 Republican platform was first presented to the resolutions committee in Philadelphia, it contained two paragraphs unequivocally endorsing the reciprocal-trade-agreements program, but after the platform was looked over they changed the wording to a vague phrase: "The Republican Party favors a system of reciprocal trade." They did not say anything about agreements. They just favored reciprocal trade. They were beginning to hedge.

Mr. JENKINS. Of course, we talked about reciprocal trade because we are the originators of it. As I said in my remarks this afternoon, the reciprocal-trade-agreements program is a Republican matter, but we managed it under a system by which the officials down here in the Washington departments were responsible to the Congress. That is where it ought to be.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I will tell the gentleman what you did last year. You reported a bill out of the Ways and Means Committee unanimously supported by the Republican membership. You reported it under a gag rule so that no amendments could be offered and with only 3 hours of general debate. No amendments could be offered, as I said. That bill was passed by the House under the whip of the Republican majority, and the bill was so bad that Secretary Marshall said he would rather have no bill at all because the bill was so bad nothing could possibly be done. There was such a protest throughout the country at the terms of that bill that the other body, after studying the matter a little bit, improved it to a great extent. There is no question but what the Republican membership was committed to killing the program and the act they passed would have killed the program if it had not been for the other body and we would not have been able to start the negotiations that have already been held.

Mr. JENKINS. If this is such a terrible thing we did, why did President Truman sign the bill?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I said what the House passed was so terrible the Secretary of State made the unequivocal statement in writing—it is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—that he would rather have no measure at all than the one passed by the House. The other body made some improvement and corrections in it which were accepted because we had a little foresight. We thought perhaps we could start preliminary negotiations and in the fall of the year we could correct it. That is what is coming about, Mr. Chairman, we are correcting the dark deeds that were done last year.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Is this bill open to amendment? Is the bill subject to amendment on the floor of the House?

Mr. EBERHARTER. Oh, yes. We Democrats follow the policy, of course, of having free and open debate, as many hours as you want today, then tomorrow you will have all the opportunity you want to offer amendments, provided they are in order. We made it an open rule in order to give all of the Members, including the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he wants to, an opportunity to offer amendments. We did not do anything like was done last year.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. I am sure the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania remembers that the bill brought in last year by the Republicans was under a closed rule, with no amendments permitted except those offered by the committee.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Yes. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will remember that. I assume, perhaps, that he wanted to offer an amendment last year, but his leadership would not permit him to do it by reason of the gag rule that was in effect.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The rules were broad enough to protect our interests. I want to know whether this bill will be subject to amendment that will give us a chance to protect our fishery, and boot and shoe, and watch industries.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I am glad the gentleman mentioned fisheries. Let me tell you something about that poor fishing industry. I think I have it here. The fishermen came down from New England. That is the section where the gentleman from Massachusetts comes from. They painted a very dismal picture about the flood of fish that were being imported. The whole industry was simply being ruined. It was a pitiful situation; pitiful. Well, Mr. Chairman, we wanted to get the facts on this problem of fish, and we asked a few questions. We asked them how many additional boats would be needed by the New England fishermen to bring in the fish that were being imported. What do you suppose the answer was? Six boats would bring in all the fish that were being imported, that were ruining the fishing industry. Afterward they reduced that figure. But, you know, if six boats can ruin a fishing industry, it is a pitiful situation, I will say to my colleague from Massachusetts.

There is another point I want to bring out.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I think the gentleman is well acquainted with some of the fishery-industry men that came down and testified.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I am sure the answer was incorrectly given or accepted. Even six vessels will not bring in 54,000,000 pounds of fish a year. I think the gentleman will agree to that.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I do not know how many fish there were. It depends on how big they are. Of course, there are different sized fish. Some member of the committee—I think it was the gentleman from Tennessee here—asked about the average annual income of these fishermen. I hope my colleague from Massachusetts will listen to this. You know, the crews of these fishing vessels are not paid wages; they are paid a share depending upon how many fish are caught. The answer was that the average earnings were around $5,000 per man per year last year. Of course, in 1945 they only made $4,500 a year—these poor fishermen. Now they are making about $5,000. Then the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] asked about their production. The production, Mr. Chairman, has doubled over what it was before the war. So, they certainly need a lot of tariff protection.

Oh, I have a lot of other instances here, Mr. Chairman. Here is one industry representative—I do not want to mention his name because it might embarrass the whole industry—but he was just weeping about what the imports were doing to their particular industry, or the industry he was speaking for. "We have the competition of these cheap imports from abroad," he said. "One manufacturer felt the competition so he had to do something he had never done before." We waited and waited and waited for the answer, and what do you suppose this manufacturer had been forced to do? He had been forced to advertise. That is the first time he had ever been forced to do that in all the history of his business. So he had been forced to advertise because of these serious imports that were coming in here.

They bring in this question of communism. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] said that these Communists are the ones that are forming this State Department policy; that they are the ones that are going to make up these trade-agreement programs. I suppose if there are any Communists to be found in the Government, that will be justification for every Republican Member to take a stand against every bill that is recommended by the President of the United States and by the departments down here—merely because somebody accuses somebody else of being a fellow traveler or having communistic leanings. It is easy to find a reason, you know, if you just point to somebody's name, Alger Hiss or somebody like that. Then we should oppose these programs, it is argued.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that the United States Chamber of Commerce, the United States associates of the International Chamber of Commerce, the National Foreign Trade

Council, the National Council of American Importers, the National Farmers Union, the American Farm Bureau Association, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, the American Federation of Labor, and about 80 percent of the people of the United States are in favor of this program, so this flank attack, this attack by these special pleaders that come down here time after time, pleading especially the fear that something might happen to their industry—I think we should just about consider their true value and remember that they are special pleaders and pay no attention to them, because in the entire history of this act, since 1934, which is 14 years, at least, there have been only three complaints filed in the Tariff Commission. Two of the complaints were dismissed by the Tariff Commission itself as having no evidence to support their contention that they might in the future be injured, and the third complaint is still being investigated and has not been decided.

So, Mr. Chairman, I hope that on tomorrow, when some of these amendments are offered which really have no merit to them whatever, at least our side of the aisle will stand fast and send to the other body the measure which the President of the United States asked for, which the Democratic Members ran on their platforms when they campaigned for reelection to this body and for new election to this body. Let us go on in such a manner that we can show the European countries and all the rest of the world that we really mean it when we say we want to remove trade barriers, we want to have more international good will. We not only want to help raise the standard of living of the people of the United States but we want to help Europe recover. Let us go forward in a more peaceful world and not throw up barriers and set a bad example to all the rest of the world.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, the Eightieth Congress passed a 1-year extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act and placed in the law a provision that in effect reestablished the United States Tariff Commission as an agent of the legislative branch of the Federal Government. The 1-year extension was made in order to have the law expire at the same time the charter of the International Trade Organization will come before this Congress for consideration, so that these closely knit Siamese twins, the ITO and the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, might be considered by Congress at one and the same time.

The Tariff Commission, when first set up, was an agent of the Congress, bipartisan in make-up, composed of experts. In 1934, when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was passed, the Tariff Commission was buried in and subordinated to the executive department. Many of its findings and reports thereafter were made to the President and kept from the Members of Congress. The Eightieth Congress, in extending the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, in substance reestablished the Tariff Commission as an agent of the Congress, but provided that the Commission make a report to the President for his guidance in making future trade agreements. If for any reason he disregarded the findings of the Tariff Commission as to peril points, then the President would be required to make available to the Congress the Tariff Commission's Report, along with his reasons for disregarding the recommendations of the Commission as to peril points.

H. R. 1211, now before the Congress, proposes to repeal the 1948 act; to extend the period for 3 years from last June 12; to bury or subordinate the Tariff Commission again within the executive department; and to divorce it from the legislative department. Is that what we want to do?

Mr. Chairman, the United States adopted its reciprocal trade program in 1934. The program has been in operation 14 years. Its objective is to reduce or remove world trade barriers and permit the free flow of goods between countries, thereby removing one of the principal causes of war. That is an excellent objective, a very worthy purpose. How has it worked out? Testimony given before the Ways and Means Committee at recent hearings brought out the following very disappointing facts:

First. After 14 years, world trade barriers are greater today than ever before.

Second. We have experienced World War II, and the world today is in greater fear of war than when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was adopted.

Third. American industries are being injured, American workers have lost their jobs, even though the full impact of the program upon our American industries has not as yet fully materialized.

Dr. Clair Wilcox, formerly Director of the Office of International Trade Policy of the State Department, and one of the best-posted men in America on our foreign-trade program, in commenting on the results of the 14-year record of our reciprocal-trade-agreements program, made this statement before the United States Chamber of Commerce Institute on June 15, 1948:

> The trade of the world today is more tightly regimented than it ever has been before in history, in time of peace. The tariff is the old-fashioned method of restricting trade. It is the mildest method of restricting trade that exists at the present time. As a matter of fact, a nation that confines trade restriction to the use of a tariff today can be said to be pursuing a liberal trade policy.

The June 1948 monthly letter of the National City Bank of New York contained the following statement:

> Foreign producers criticize our protective duties on certain articles. Nevertheless, the United States market generally is freer of access today than practically any other market in the world.

Mr. Chairman, embargoes, quotas, preferences, import license restrictions, currency manipulations, subsidies, state trading, and other restrictive trade devices have been adopted by foreign nations to control the movement of trade. They are much more restrictive than simple tariff barriers. Our feeble tariff barriers are as nothing when compared with the trade barriers set up by governments that have entered into reciprocal trade agreements with us.

Mr. Chairman, we have built up a watch industry in the United States that gives employment to scores of thousands of workers. These workers are paid a reasonably high wage that enables them to live decently upon a standard of living that is the highest in the world. Switzerland, under our reciprocal-trade-agreements program, has been dumping millions of watches on our American market at far less than it costs to manufacture them here. This has forced our factories either to go out of business or to go on part-time production. What is the difference between importing cheap labor to compete with our American labor—which our immigration laws forbid—and importing the products of cheap labor to compete with the product of our factories—which our reciprocal trade program permits—thereby robbing our factory workers of their jobs?

Before World War II—1931–35—47 percent of the American market for jeweled watches was supplied by imported watches from Switzerland, and 53 percent of the American market was supplied by our own American jeweled watch industries. In 1936 we negotiated a reciprocal trade agreement with Switzerland. Later our American watch factories were retooled and converted for war needs, making precision instruments for the Army and Navy. Switzerland then took over the American market for jeweled watches to such an extent that by 1946 Switzerland supplied 86 percent of the jeweled watches sold in America.

Since 1941, when we entered the war, a total of 59,000,000 Swiss watches have been imported. During the last 4 years, 1945–48, an average of more than 9,000,000 Swiss watches were imported each year. This importation of Swiss watches under our reciprocal trade agreement with Switzerland has seriously damaged our American-watch industry. Today there are only three American-jeweled watch companies left in the United States, Elgin, Hamilton, and Waltham, and the Waltham Watch Co. is already bankrupt and in the hands of a receiver.

Mr. Chairman, the serious question concerning the American-jeweled watch industry is the important part it plays in national defense. It is absolutely essential that a pool or reservoir of skilled watchmakers be maintained, to be drawn upon in time of war to make precision time instruments—chronometers, fire-control watches, time fuses, aircraft instruments, jewel bearings, etc.—without which not a battleship nor a warplane can be operated, not a bomb can be dropped, not a torpedo nor a rocket bomb fired, until a delicate timing instrument to operate it has been installed. There is no other source for the kind of skill needed to make these precision instruments other than the jeweled-watch industry. Yet our reciprocal trade agreement with Switzerland has almost destroyed our American jeweled-watch industry, an industry so essential to our national defense.

Switzerland has captured the world trade in jeweled watches. Even the American market has been taken over to the extent of 80 percent. Switzerland furnished practically all of the precision instruments used by Germany in the last war. She also furnished most of the precision instruments used by our European allies. She could do this because she was a neutral in the war. Do we want to become dependent upon Switzerland in time of war for precision instruments? Dare we risk such dependency?

Mr. Chairman, after 14 years of experimentation with reciprocal trade agreements, it is time for us to "stop, look, and listen"; it is time for us to analyze, to weigh, and to measure the results of the reciprocal trade program before we extend it for 3 more years, without the safeguards that were placed in it by the 1948 act. A careful analysis of the results of our 14 years' experience convinces me of the following:

First. The program has not contributed to international goodwill.

Second. The program has not removed nor reduced world trade barriers with the exception of our own.

Third. The program has neither prevented war nor removed the threat of war.

Fourth. The program has already damaged some American industries and thrown some American workmen out of work, even though the impact of the program upon our economy has not as yet fully materialized.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the passage of H. R. 1211 without proper and necessary safeguards being incorporated in the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COMBS].

Mr. COMBS. Mr. Chairman, I intend, in what I am going to say, to deal principally with the question of the jeweled watch industry as affected by our reciprocal-trade agreements, which subject has been discussed by two or three preceding speakers, including the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

Before doing that, however, I want to talk just briefly on two other points discussed by preceding speakers.

The opposition to this bill has repeatedly discussed the peril-point proposition—that provision of the law of 1948 whereby the Tariff Commission is authorized to make a finding of that point below which, in its judgment, tariff rates cannot be lowered without injury to particular commodities. Instead of that provision being to the benefit of the manufacturer, it so hamstrings our representatives in negotiating trade agreements as to work against the American manufacturer. Let us follow that thought a little further. The theory of reciprocal trade is that the representatives of our country and other countries will sit around the table, and that mutual concessions will be made. In return for a concession made by us in respect to an article the negotiating country will make some concession with respect to the admission of American goods. In some instances instead of keeping out or reducing imports by high tariffs which would increase the cost to the American consumer, an agreement is negotiated whereby we limit imports.

It is necessary that our negotiators shall be free at the conference to make adjustment in return for concessions made to us by other countries. The peril-point theory as injected into the law by the act of 1948 removes the Tariff Commission from negotiations and requires it to sit back as a sort of separate entity to make a finding before the negotiation begins as to the point below which a rate cannot be lowered. That is an invitation to the American negotiators to go down to that point. Mr. Thorpe, testifying for the State Department, said that in many instances the negotiators had not gone as far in the reductions in certain tariffs as they would have been authorized to go by the findings of the Tariff Commission. From 1934 on to last year the members of the Tariff Commission with their expert knowledge and information sat in the negotiations. They could express then and there their view concerning the peril point, and lend their expert advice and assistance in the negotiations. But the effect of the restrictive amendment of the act of 1948 is to take them completely out of the negotiations, forbid them the right of attending the sessions where these agreements are negotiated. They are left in this country. Thereby our negotiators are deprived of the advice and expert help, counsel, and judgment of the Tariff Commission. In the second place, we talk about the danger of imports. Among nations, as among men, no nation can purchase more abroad than it can sell; it cannot long buy more than it sells without bankruptcy. If other nations are to buy our goods and pay their debts to us, they must sell us their goods and services. All over the world, from World War I on down, the world has maintained an uneasy sort of economic unbalance in which we have kept up world trade by grants and loans and the purchase of foreign gold which we buried at Fort Knox while the economy of the other nations languished. At long last we came to the viewpoint that trade is not a one-way street. That world prosperity depends on world trade. We came further to the viewpoint that we could not long maintain the prosperity and the freedom of our own Nation as a little island of prosperity and peace in a worldwide sea of rags and misery. That is the basis of the whole reciprocal trade agreements program.

A while ago the gentleman from New York, for whom I have the greatest respect, was tracing our downward decline toward a Niagara of destruction, as a result of reciprocal trade. I could not help but reflect that last year the profits of the American economy, the corporate profits of our Nation after the payment of taxes reached the highest peak in the Nation's history. Where is the Niagara? It does not exist except in the imagination of those who oppose the program that has worked so successfully for 14 years.

One other thing the gentleman from Nebraska referred to the grave harm done to the synthetic-rubber industry by the policies of the State Department. This happens to be something I know a little about, for the biggest synthetic-rubber plant in the world is located in my district, at Port Neches, Tex. It has a rated capacity of 125,000 tons of synthetic rubber a year. Right now it is operating at more than 50,000 tons a year above its rated capacity, turning out the synthetic rubber that goes to your tire plants in Ohio and other places. It is turning out this rubber for several cents a pound cheaper than you can import the natural rubber. It has increased the life of automobile tires more than double. They are now installing a new process, making "cold rubber," which will add one-third longer life to passenger-car tires. Because of this industry, which has been fostered by the policies of our Government, we have kept the price of automobile tires away down below what other comparable products have gone to in this period of inflation. At no time has the synthetic-rubber industry flourished as it is flourishing today. The gentleman from Nebraska was without his facts when he said that the policies of our Government have injuriously affected the synthetic-rubber industry.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it not true that we have bound ourselves never to impose a tariff on rubber?

Mr. COMBS. I do not know about our binding ourselves. I know that our agreements have escape clauses. I know we have the rubber and we have it cheap and we have the best rubber and our rubber plants are operating successfully. So why worry?

Mr. CURTIS. Is it not true that we have bound ourselves not to increase the percentage of synthetic rubber that is required to go into our domestic consumption?

Mr. COMBS. There may have been some agreements with local industries. I do not know.

Mr. CURTIS. No, with foreign countries.

Mr. COMBS. With foreign countries?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. COMBS. The agreements we have so far may have been made to protect the American synthetic rubber industry. I'm not familiar with the agreements you refer to, but I do not think our synthetic rubber plants are operating at capacity production. The agreements may have been to protect against foreign imports.

Mr. CURTIS. That is not borne out in the hearings by testimony of the State Department.

Mr. COMBS. We will not argue that now.

Now let us go to the watch question. First of all, considerable argument has been made that the policies of our Government are completely wrecking the jewel watch industry and that this is going to sabotage our national defense. For fear some of you may overlook it, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means placed in the RECORD this morning a letter from the Hon.

James Forrestal, head of our defense establishment. I want to read you one paragraph of that letter:

> The domestic jewel watch industry has fulfilled its role in our program of national defense, and I am not aware that its capabilities have been adversely affected by the Reciprocal Trade Authority.

During the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee it became evident that opponents of reciprocal trade extension would use the Waltham Watch Co. as a horrible example of the great injury they contend is being done American manufacturers in general, and the watch industry in particular, by foreign imports under our reciprocal trade program. Much interesting testimony on this subject came out during the hearings. But knowing the opponents of the pending bill would use the alleged injury to the watch industry by Swiss imports, and that the present difficulty of the Waltham Watch Co. would be used as an example, I decided to pursue a little research in an effort to discover what the real trouble with the Waltham Watch Co. is. Several witnesses, including Hon. Charles P. Taft, made the statement that Waltham's difficulty is not due to foreign competition but to mismanagement. I shall shortly submit some facts that I think support this view beyond question. But before doing this let me make these observations.

The Waltham Watch Co. is about 100 years old. Its product bears an honored name in the American watch business. The company is now in financial difficulties and is undergoing a reorganization that I sincerely hope will put it back on its feet as one of the fine and prosperous industries of this country. The mayor of the city of Waltham and the entire citizenry of the community and the 2,300 employees of the Waltham Watch Co. have banded together and are digging into their savings, mortgaging their homes, and pledging portions of their future pay in order to raise a part of the capital needed to get the company on its feet again. I may add that the employees at Waltham have foregone requests for two pay raises that have been received by employees of other companies, and in one instance took a cut in their wages. The people of Waltham and the people of all Massachusetts, for that matter, are proud of the name and prestige of the Waltham watch. And I am sure the people of all America recognize with pride the efforts the employees and citizens of Waltham are making to rehabilitate their great industry. It is the same fine spirit the members of the Massachusetts community exhibited nearly 175 years ago. I am sure that every one of us wants our Government to do everything it can to assist these valiant Americans, and I am sure that it will be done. As a matter of fact, I am advised that RFC has agreed to extend a loan in the amount of several millions of dollars to assist in the modernization and rehabilitation of the Waltham Co. conditioned upon a reorganization that will insure successful operation.

But today we are debating a bill which would restore and extend the reciprocal-trade-agreements plan first inaugurated in 1934. And we are here met with the argument that the troubles at Waltham are caused by foreign competition. Is Waltham a case where a successful and prosperous company has been wrecked by imports under reciprocal trade? Or is its present plight the result of the failure of its management to use sound and modern methods of manufacturing techniques, sales, and financial policies? Well, let's see what the evidence is.

Mr. Cenerazzo, the president of the union representing the watchmakers in the plant, stated during his testimony before the Ways and Means Committee that mismanagement—and he emphasized financial skullduggery as well as poor choice of equipment, lack of advertising, improper distribution methods and other errors—was the primary difficulty at Waltham. A statement from the mayor of the city of Waltham read before the committee quoted the findings of two surveys of the situation to the effect that mismanagement and lack of working capital were the reasons for Waltham's condition.

Unfortunately, this condition seems to be nothing new at Waltham.

In the last day or so I have had the opportunity to examine a book entitled "Timing a Century"—history of the Waltham Watch Co. It was prepared by Mr. Charles W. Moore and published in 1945. It seems the study was suggested by the president of Waltham, and the Waltham Co., according to the preface in the book, provided financial assistance in publication. Now here are a few of the many interesting facts revealed by the book. Waltham Watch Co. was founded in 1850. But in 1857, only 7 years after it was established, it went through bankruptcy, was sold by the sheriff at auction for $56,000, and the proceeds prorated among its creditors. The company was promptly reorganized but was forced to close in September of that same year. It was reorganized and from 1859 to 1882 the company prospered in large part because of the demand which developed for watches during the Civil War. In 1864 the Elgin Watch Co. was organized and later two other companies were established. These companies began a strong competition and in 1891 Waltham found itself again in difficulties. It barely survived the panic of 1893. By 1901, however, the Waltham Co. was again prosperous. It seems that a sort of working agreement, or trust if you please, had been worked out among the American watch manufacturers so that they sold their products to the American people at a much higher price than they sold on the foreign market.

I recall reading, when I was a child, a statement, from William J. Bryan who was fighting high tariffs, in which he stated among other things that he had purchased a Waltham watch at a jewelry store in London for about one-half of what the same watch would cost him at an American jewelry store. This was around the turn of the century. But by 1904 President Theodore Roosevelt began his trust-busting crusade and the Waltham profits began to decline. And during the panic of 1907 declining earnings of the company, decay of management, and manipulations of securities sales caused a stockholders' revolt. The company again went through the wringer and was reorganized in 1910. It then began to diversify its production by adding traveling clocks, automobile clocks, time fuses, and automobile speedometers. Sales to the Government during World War I contributed to the company's earnings and it seems to have done very well until the depression of 1921 when Waltham again faced bankruptcy. This time, incompetence of the managing executives was a controlling factor. The company was saved from collapse at that time by liberal loans from banks, and the banks took it over. Their management was not successful and the Waltham Co. was again reorganized in 1923. The new management recognized that Waltham had not been producing what the market wanted, that the Swiss was setting the pace and style, particularly in small wrist watches. There was also recognition that the Swiss had developed superior watch-making machinery, and that Waltham prices were too high.

Waltham seems to have done very well until the begininng of the depression in 1930 when it again found itself in difficulties. It then spearheaded the move to curtail imports of watches and along with other domestic watch companies, Waltham was successful in getting into the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, the highest tariff rates on watches that this country has ever had. But instead of helping the situation it caused bootlegging of watches into this country and other difficulties. The outbreak of World War II produced war orders which enabled Waltham to keep going. But by 1944 it was in difficulties again, and changed presidents. It went into bankruptcy early this year.

These facts, it seems to me, establish beyond question the truth of the observation of Mr. Taft and other witnesses that Waltham's trouble is internal and is not due to foreign competition. There are many other facts that could be submitted in support of that view. For example two other American watch manufacturing companies, Elgin and Hamilton, have just completed the best year in their history—selling more watches, making as much or more profit as ever before. They did almost as well in 1947. Mr. James G. Shennan, president of the Elgin National Watch Co., has supplied the committee with information as to the combined sales, combined net profits, and the percentage of profits on sales made by three American watch manufacturing companies, Elgin, Hamilton, and Waltham, for the years 1940, 1941, 1946, and 1947. I want to read these figures to you:

| Year | Combined sales | Combined net profit | Percent of sales |
| 1940 | $25,857,000 | $2,724,000 | 10.53 |
| 1941 | 33,413,000 | 3,060,000 | 9.16 |
| 1946 | 39,902,000 | 1,950,000 | 4.89 |
| 1947 | 49,131,000 | 1,830,000 | 3.72 |

Elgin and Hamilton have been working at capacity since they reconverted from war work and, according to a statement in the National Jeweler of December 1948, page 274, made by W. H. Samelius, the director of Elgin Watchmakers College, the demand for watchmakers is so great that all students are placed even before graduation, and there is a waiting list for entrance. Mr. Samelius expects the demand for watchmakers to far exceed the supply for at least 2 to 5 years.

Now, these facts speak for themselves. If other plants are working at capacity, selling more watches, making as much or more money as before, is it reasonable to believe that the one plant that has failed was the victim of foreign competition? It would not be reasonable to say that even if Waltham had fallen behind the others in the market. But the simple truth is that Waltham made sales in 1947 that were almost double any prewar year, and the second highest in the company's history. Yet, Waltham managed to turn in a deficit of nearly $400,000 that year. And, if further proof were needed that Swiss imports are not destroying the American industry it is to be found in the expansion program presently going on at some of the American plants. The president of Elgin stated before our committee that about 20 to 25 percent increase is contemplated. The Gruen Watch Co. is erecting in New York a domestic manufacturing plant to supplement its import activities at a cost of about $5,000,000. The Bulova Watch Co. now manufactures in this country about one-half of the watches it sells here. Would these companies be using their reserves to go into or increase their participation in the domestic market if they felt they would be put out of business by foreign competition under our reciprocal trade program?

No, it was not foreign imports that brought about Waltham's difficulties. The evidence is overwhelming that it was mismanagement of the plant and its facilities. The company itself in its bankruptcy petition, recently filed, stated:

> The debtor is an old and established manufacturer of watches, whose name has for many years been associated in the retail market throughout the United States with quality watches; the debtor's present financial condition is due primarily to lack of working capital. The debtor believes that the enterprise is fundamentally sound and that its stability will be restored as a result of reorganization.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I wonder whether the gentleman remembers the statement made in the hearings that the annual consumption or sale of watches is approximately 9,000,000, whereas the entire American watch industry can produce only 3,000,000, so that we need the importation of about 6,000,000 works in order to supply the American market.

Mr. COMBS. The gentleman is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. COMBS. Let us take a moment out to consider this. The demand for watches in America has increased by leaps and bounds. The present American companies could not supply one-half the demand. Suppose we shut off these Swiss importations and create a monopoly in four manufacturing companies in the United States, with the present demand, where would watch prices go? I have here a Hamilton watch which was presented to me in December in my home town. The jeweler told the purchaser that it was the last one he had in stock and was complaining that his consignor had not been able to get a sufficient supply of high-grade American jeweled watches to supply his customers. There is no evidence at all of any shortage of markets for the products of this country in the watch business.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. It was testified in the hearings that if there were no importations of works, that the prices of watches and wrist watches to the American public would be two or three times as much as they are today.

Mr. COMBS. That is correct.

Mr. EBERHARTER. It is practically impossible for a man to buy a good watch today. It is impossible for an ordinary workingman to buy a good watch today unless he saves for a considerable number of weeks so as to get enough money to buy one.

Mr. COMBS. That is correct. I want to point out another thing. Even the American watch manufacturers have come to value competition. Under the spur of competition the Elgin Watch Co. 2 years ago invented a watch spring, revolutionizing the business. Another concern invented an electronic machine for testing watches. Theretofore it took 4 to 6 months to test and regulate a watch after it was made. Now they have electronic machines which will do it in 2 minutes. That is by the application of the American know-how. In that fashion we will get more watches and better watches for the American people, and at the same time pay higher wages to the people making them. One other thing: these watch-importing companies that import the works into this country have to have cases, straps, boxes, and many other things. These are all made in this country. And the men and women who work in these assembly plants are just as skilled and just as highly paid as those who work in the places that manufacture completely their own watch works in the United States.

Mind you, these American companies that make their own watches import certain parts from Switzerland. If you were to shut out Swiss imports today, you would wreck every American watch company in the country. That reminds me of one other thing. These imports from Switzerland thus far have been reasonable. They can be handled under this adjustable plan of reciprocal trade. I would remind you that the Swiss people are a free people who maintain a high standard of living. The testimony before us was that there is very little difference in the cost of a Swiss movement and a comparable movement made in this country after the payment of the present tariff.

Otherwise, these companies having factories in both places would not have an American factory in this country. Our great watch business is developing because first we went to Switzerland and established factories there and then took the skills that we learned there and transferred them to this country, thus building up one of the great industries of the world, the watch industry of America.

Now, these Swiss people are free people. Switzerland is the oldest Republic in the world. Should we fail and refuse to exchange our goods for theirs and shut the doors of import in their faces, what would we be saying to the rest of the world that we are encouraging to adopt our kind of free life? Why, it is ridiculous.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. I happen to represent one of the largest watch industries. I know that right now in Waterbury, Conn., the United States Time Corp. is closing. Why? Because we are importing from Switzerland. Are we going to take the welfare of other countries and the welfare of their people ahead of the welfare of our own country and of our working people? I think our people should be No. 1 on the list.

Mr. COMBS. I do, too, sir. I think that they are No. 1 on the list. Permit me to make this observation.

I have not studied the Waterbury situation. But they make clocks, and clock-type watch movements as I understand it.

Mr. PATTERSON. They make clocks and watches.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. I yield.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman from Connecticut refers to a company that makes the pin-lever or clock watch. The importations from Switzerland are of jewel-lever watches only.

Mr. COMBS. That is right.

Mr. MILLS. We do not import the watches that the gentleman refers to, thus I cannot see how he can associate imports into the United States, imports which do not exist, with the laying off of men in the plant to which he refers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COMBS].

Mr. COMBS. Now I will be as brief as I can.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. I am sorry. I cannot yield now. I must finish.

RFC has agreed to furnish $6,000,000 if the trustees can raise another $5,000,000 from private sources to put the Waltham Co. back on its feet as a going concern. The workers in the plant have agreed to raise $1,000,000 themselves. I understand they have already pledged more than $400,000 of that amount. The businessmen and citizens of Waltham feel certain they can get the remaining $4,000,000 from other sources. So, it would seem that the problem of Waltham will be solved within the near future. I trust that the efforts of the workers and other citizens of the city of Waltham will be rewarded with the establishment of a fine, going concern. As the first, and in many respects the most highly respected manufacturer of fine American jeweled watches, the Waltham Co. is a great representative of the American watch industry. Its rehabilitation and successful operation will be a real American achievement by the people of Waltham. They will share the general prosperity that has come to this country as a result of our reciprocal trade agreements.

We have to look at this question of reciprocal trade agreements with the understanding that by it we are able to sell our surplus products to other countries and they can sell their products to us. The Swiss purchase many kinds of our products, such as machine tools, heavy industrial machinery, textiles, and many others. These goods bought from our country are made by our own workmen. It is in the sale of our manufactured products of that nature that we are able to sell the labor of our own people and to maintain our high standards of American living. So let us not sabotage this act that has worked so successfully for 14 years by hamstringing it with crippling amendments.

I have been surprised to see, with 2 weeks of hearings, that so few complaints have been made against the operation of this law and that no one came before the committee in those 2 weeks and expressed the idea that it should be abandoned. It has been endorsed by one Congress after another, and has demonstrated its great value.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COMBS] has again expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, just in order to get the record straight on these watches, I realize that the United States Time Corp. does not make a jeweled watch, but it does make a wrist watch. It makes the Mickey Mouse watch, for one thing, and it makes a regular wrist watch which we use every day and which is not jeweled. But the imports from Switzerland in the lower bracket of watch movements have caused a great deal of trouble in our own domestic market. People will go into a store, for instance, and there is an American-made watch, which is not jeweled, on the counter, and there is one from Switzerland which is a jeweled watch. It is easier for the salesman to sell the one from Switzerland. It is in a low bracket. It sells for about $16.95 or $19. That brings up the case of great unemployment in my district, not only in the watch industry, but in others as well. That brings up a situation that I am confronted with right now, and I know a majority of the Members from New England are faced with the same situation in connection with shoes, textiles, and our clock industry, the Waltham clock industry, for example.

What will it be next? It will be the rubber industry; and, again, I represent United States Rubber and employees in Naugatuck, Conn. How can we here in America compete with countries like Czechoslovakia, which today is dominated by the Russian Government as its satellite and where there is slave labor? Shall we let the product of that labor come in to compete with the free labor of our country? Again, there is Switzerland, a country where labor costs are low. The Swiss have a system of home industries whereby different parts of a watch are made in individual homes. They are not set up on a scale like we are; it is peacetime work within the home. How can we expect our manufacturers and working people to stay in the watch industry when they have to compete with situations like that?

Mr. Chairman, I think this House should certainly take under consideration every protection we can possibly give to our own domestic industry. Let us take the brewers of our country today. I am just taking a circle of industries that are being affected by imports. The breweries are working 4 days a week. Or take the clothing industry—and the gentleman from New York may be interested in this. What is their workweek? They are working 3 days, sometimes 3½ days a week. And I can go right on down the list of our industries that are affected by imports.

I personally believe—I am qualifying my statements, I am not trying to sum up to a jury, believe me; I am clarifying my position. I believe in reciprocal trade but not beyond the point where it is going to be injurious to my own industry here at home; because, No. 1: Charity starts at home. I believe no one on the floor of this House will disagree with that statement.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut yields back 10 minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS].

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, the tendency seems to have developed in this country within the past several years immediately to label as Communist anything with which you are in disagreement, to label it Communist or Communist-inspired. The charge has been hurled in this debate this afternoon, and I consider it not only a completely illogical argument but a thoroughly ridiculous one, that this program of promoting free trade rather than high protectionism is one that is either Communist-inspired or that it is aided and abetted by the Communists. No more ridiculous or illogical argument could possibly be advanced, because in promoting free trade, which we are attempting to do through this legislation, we are promoting something which is the antithesis of communism and planned economy. I cite the testimony before the committee of Mr. Charles P. Taft, the able brother of the senior Senator from the State of Ohio. He testified before the committee representing the Federal Council of Churches. He made this significant statement:

> The other group of opponents of the reciprocal-trade-agreements policy are those of the left, who advocate a planned economy at home. They must oppose the broadening of the base of multilateral trade because that kind of freedom is not compatible with domestic controls. In both instances, therefore, the reciprocal-trade-agreements stand for the free enterprise system, however inconsistent with that system other policies during recent years have been.
> Some of the opponents of the policy have taken the position that multilateral trade is no longer possible in the world of today, and that we should therefore adopt a pattern of bilateral closed agreements, Yankee barter deals.
> This was the program of the Nazis, and they certainly demonstrated what it could do to world trade. It is not a policy for which the American people will stand when they understand its character and effects.

In other words, here is a great American who made, in my humble opinion, the most forceful statement before the committee, asserting that this program is not only opposed by the Communists but that it is completely incompatible with their philosophy of a planned economy.

The Communists oppose this program for other reasons and other equally commanding reasons. We have adopted the European recovery program which has for its cornerstone the unification and the cooperation of the divided nations of Europe and has for its ultimate goal the rehabilitation of Europe so that the free nations of Europe working together cooperatively can stand on their own feet and again unifiedly oppose the encroachment of communism.

The cornerstone of the Marshall plan is economic cooperation, and that economic cooperation, it is our hope and belief, will ultimately lead to political cooperation; therefore, the Communists who have always attempted to dominate Europe by picking off the nations one by one, piecemeal, if you will, can see the danger to their program by continuation of the reciprocal-trade-treaty program. As a matter of fact, in my humble judgment, the Marshall plan was adopted as a direct answer to the Communist threat of picking one nation off at a time. You will recall that in March 1947, I believe it was, the President came here and delivered his message on the Greek and Turkish situation. We supported that program because it was a necessary program; it was something that had to be done; but the point was made, and I think with justification, that we had to adopt an over-all foreign policy, a policy for all of the free nations of Europe. Out of that thinking and out of that great debate developed the Marshall plan, which has created tremendous ire and apprehension on the part of those in the Kremlin.

As a direct result of the Marshall plan we are seeing in Europe today something about which statesmen have dreamed for many centuries. We are seeing a peaceful unification of that great continent. One week or so ago there was announced in London the formation of the Council of Europe, which is a direct outgrowth, in my opinion, of the adoption of the Marshall plan. The reciprocal-trade-treaty program in the mind of any fair-minded economist must be considered as an economic cornerstone of the Marshall plan in the European recovery program.

How any man who is a Member of this House can consistently support the Marshall plan and then turn around and vote against this program is beyond my comprehension, because he is denying with his right hand what his left hand is doing, and without the trade program, without the incentive to destroy barriers to trade and to commerce and to the movement of goods and materials, the Marshall plan cannot possibly succeed.

All of the arguments which have been advanced here today—and I have listened to most of them, and I do not pretend to be an authority on the history of this great debate which has been before this body for many, many years—all of the arguments advanced against this bill have been the old high-protectionist arguments. There has not been a new argument advanced here, and the only other idea pulled across the trail has been the completely illogical, ridiculous red herring that this is a program advocated and sponsored and fostered by the Communists.

Let us examine the high protectionist argument for a moment. For how many years has the argument been made in this historic body that if we fail to protect American enterprise and American goods by a high tariff we would wreck our economy? How many times have Members stood in this well, as the gentleman from Connecticut did here a moment ago, and said, "I favor the reciprocal-trade-treaty program, but I am first for my own district and for my own enterprise"? I venture to say that is the oldest, the most discredited argument which has ever been made in the House of Representatives.

What are the facts? Let us examine our economy as it stands today, the overall picture of our economy. Let us not pick out one industry here and another industry here and another one here, all of which are subject to special treatment for many and various reasons, as the gentleman from Texas has so ably stated in the case of the Waltham Watch Co., and as someone might equally ably state in the case of certain other luxury items in which production is now catching up with demand. But let us examine our entire economy, because that is what this program is.

In 1929, the Congress of the United States adopted the highest tariff in the history of our Nation, the Smoot-Hawley tariff. There followed after the adoption of that tariff the greatest tariff war in the history of modern civilization, and in place of our business increasing, in place of these great enterprises growing and increasing their domestic markets and increasing their domestic pay rolls, what happened? We had the most devastating depression that this Nation has ever known, and after the enactment of that tariff there were more people out of employment, there were more bankruptcies, there were more hardships in America, there was more social unrest in America than at any time in the history of our great Republic. That followed the enactment of the highest tariff in the history of our Nation, and the same arguments which have been advanced here today in opposition to this program were advanced in favor of the Smoot-Hawley tariff in 1929. In 1934 a great Secretary of State appeared on the scene; a man revered not only in this country but throughout the free world today. He proposed that men and nations sit down and negotiate, that we import what was good for us to import and that we export what was good for us to export, judging the entire economy.

Through his great leadership and the leadership of the Democratic Party, and the leadership of President Roosevelt, we adopted the reciprocal-trade program.

Today, after that program has been in effect for 14 years or thereabouts, American production is at the highest level in all of our history. As a matter of fact, our production has exceeded the fondest wishes of even our greatest economists. I do not recall the exact figures of the Federal Reserve Board, but I remember seeing last year, while serving on the Committee on Banking and Currency, that our production in many industries was three time, four times, five times, what it was in 1929 and 1930.

If all of these dire predictions had any merit, then would our production be at the level at which it now stands in our country? I say to you that the proof of the reciprocal-trade-treaty program is self-evident, and stands as a great symbol of the economic advancement and prosperity of this country. Anyone who doubts it has only to compare what happened after 1929, when we listened to the high protectionists and when we enacted the highest tariffs in the history of the United States, and we had a depression, with the situation today, after 14 or 15 years of the operation of this program, and look at the vast producing enterprise of the United States of America. When you add to that the further important, commanding, paramount consideration that this program is intimately connected with the entire foreign policy of the United States, that this program is fought and feared by the Communists in the Kremlin, that this program has within it the seeds for the reestablishment of free trade and free enterprise all over Europe, it seems to me the height of inconsistency on the part of those who oppose communism to oppose this program.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Chairman, I have just heard the very forceful remarks of the gentleman from Louisiana, who has made a very fine presentation of the old free-trade, destructive arguments. I have heard them many times and they are published in many books. Still, we are here as the United States of America. Washington was interested in the first protective-tariff bill, and the tariff policy has underwritten free enterprise of the United States. It was recommended by Hamilton. We built this Nation on that plan of keeping our markets as far as we could here in this country for our people and for the benefit not of few but all of them. Of course, I have heard this old free-trade argument, which is to buy in the cheapest markets in the world. The gentleman stated in his remarks, and very able remarks, that H. R. 1211 is a free-trade proposition. Well, you are down pretty low on the list. The other nations have all the world for their market, and they have over 60 percent of our market. Well over 60 percent of our imports come in free of duty.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to argue over the question of whether the trade agreements program has accomplished or has not accomplished some of the things that have been said here this afternoon. I often, however, do become somewhat amused when I listen to some of the proponents of free trade condemn those who might desire to give some degree of protection to our domestic economy when they themselves insist, not upon tariff or duty protection, but upon even more severe protection as the interference to the free flow of trade may be concerned. I call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Louisiana has just made a very fine address advocating great freedom of exchange of goods between the various countries of the world. I believe in the freest possible exchange, but I wonder if he would answer this question for me. Will he agree today to the elimination of the quota on sugar imports into this country? No; the gentleman comes from an area which produces sugar. There is an import quota on sugar. That is the maximum restriction that you can possibly have on any commodity. It is not a matter of just making the sugar competitive with American sugar as far as the protection of his industry is concerned—absolutely not. His protection is a quantitative restriction against the importation of sugar. What about our tobacco boys and various other of these people who come here and condemn those of us who want to see our industries have at least a fair degree of protection in the world markets? Let's take tobacco for example.

You cannot export one single seed of tobacco. Why? Because, if you do, it might mean that that tobacco might be produced elsewhere in the world and that that production might compete with our American-produced tobacco.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman from Wisconsin may not want to overlook the Louisiana rice industry, which enjoys a tariff protection of a modified rate of 2 cents per pound or $2 per 100 pounds. I join with the gentleman in criticizing southern people who ask for tariffs on what they produce and then deny the same protection to northern agriculture and northern industry. You cannot justify it in any way.

Protect all of us, North, South, East, and West. Then I will go along with you, but I will not go along with you on this idea of protecting one little section such as tobacco, rice, sugar, and so forth, and destroying the rest of us.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman from Michigan. But, as I say, it is not my intention to go into the various ramifications of free trade versus protectionism and so forth. I think this afternoon we have gone around in a pretty big circle and have covered quite a large field and a great deal of territory.

As, if, and when we come down to the basic issue involved in the bill, H. R. 1211, I want to say it is not nearly as complicated as we have tried to make it appear this afternoon. I would like to refer those Members present to the minority report. I would like to read one of the introductory statements in that report, because I believe it gives to us what, basically, is the issue involved in this debate, and which will be involved tomorrow when we consider this matter under the 5-minute rule. I quote:

> We favor the extension rather than the repeal of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948. We appreciate, however, that as the result of false political characterizations, the 1948 Act is destined to fall.

That is certainly apparent from the orders that have come down from on high to you gentlemen on the majority side.

> In our opinion, however, such action is a manifestation that political emotionalism has triumphed over judgment and reason. Under such conditions, even the preservation of existing constructive legislation is unlikely. In view of this, and without retreating from principle, we urge that, as a bare minimum, H. R. 1211 be amended to provide—
> (1) for the continuation of the "peril point" report of the Tariff Commission established by the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948; and
> (2) for the insertion of an "escape clause" in all trade agreements which do not now contain such a clause.

The fundamental issue before us today and tomorrow is whether or not in the extension of the Trade Agreements Act we have those two provisions which are safeguards to the domestic economy.

I have not heard one single Member, speaking from the majority side, tell us what is wrong with those two protective features proposed by the minority. Not one.

We have been referred to the position of various groups that appeared before our committee in the study of the Trade Agreements Act. I think for the most part most of them believe sincerely, as I do, that we must continue some kind of negotiated agreements with foreign countries, in order to make possible the free flow of trade; but many, many of them say and feel that there should be certain limits, certain safeguards, so that those people who do the negotiating, when we enter into such agreements, do not exceed the bounds of propriety and the bounds that are necessary in order to maintain our domestic economy.

I would like to refresh the memory of those who sit on the committee and to call to the attention of those who do not serve on the committee and who did not have the benefit of the testimony of those who appeared before the committee, to some of the points made by representatives of these organizations.

I take, for instance, the American Federation of Labor. They did say that they believed in the extension of the Trade Agreements Act. I do not question that at all. They are for it and I am for it. But they put in a word of caution, and let me quote Mr. Mason, the spokesman for the American Federation of Labor. Let me quote also from a resolution which was passed at the American Federation of Labor convention in Cincinnati:

> In supporting the trade-agreements program we recognize the need of safeguarding American labor in some industries, especially where the wages are a relatively high factor in the cost of production, against competition that threatens to undermine our labor standards.

Gentlemen, that is just what the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee want to do. That is the identical purpose of these two amendments that will be offered tomorrow.

Let me say further, I asked Mr. Mason during the course of the proceedings, and I am quoting from page 179 of the hearing, this question:

> You know under the act passed last year one of the basic requirements, and the thing we hear the most complaint about, is that it is required by law that the Tariff Commission do establish what we call peril points——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin (continuing reading):

> do establish what we call peril points; in other words, the point below which the domestic industry might be imperiled and the workingman in this country and his standard of living be imperiled, so you agree with me that is advisable procedure and the advisable thing to do?
> Mr. MASON. That is right. We favor that. We favor the continuation of those findings.

That, Mr. Chairman, is all that the amendment pertaining to peril points which will be offered by the minority pretends to do; and that is all it does.

We have the National Farm Bureau Federation, which said it believed in the extension of the Trade Agreements Act. Let me point out their position on this matter. I call attention to page 694 of the hearings. Mr. Kline, representing the American Farm Bureau Federation, said:

> We have not taken a specific position in which we took up the matter of peril points and said: "This is our position with regard to the Trade Commission as regards establishing peril points." At the same time, we have taken a position which makes it clear that we would oppose a proposition which made it possible for the Trade Commission to use this point or some other point to delay the development of a reciprocal-trade-agreement program. We certainly want that information available, and we certainly want it taken into consideration as the sort of machinery for the development of the reciprocal trade that we have suggested.

In other words, if the procedure desired does not delay the entering into agreements, Mr. Kline, in so many words, says they want that information and believe that that machinery should remain a part of the act.

We also find, Mr. Chairman, that the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation, another large agricultural group, took a stand on this matter at its thirty-second annual convention. Let me read from page 258 of the hearings an excerpt from a resolution adopted by that organization on November 11, 1948:

> We favor a further extension of the Trade Agreements Act, but only on condition that adequate safeguards are written into the law to govern the exercise of the powers therein conferred. Such safeguards should include a procedure before the Tariff Commission similar to that provided in the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948 to determine the safe limits within which tariff modifications can be made.

That is a great farm organization speaking and I think, Mr. Chairman, that it states the basic issue involved in the discussion here today.

What is wrong with the two safeguard provisions that the minority asks be put into the extension of the Trade Agreements Act? There is the issue, Mr. Chairman, and I hope sincerely that this problem can be approached with a reasonableness of heart and mind in order that we may arrive at what is right and just for the American people instead of being guided by false propaganda and by political considerations that should have no place in the discussion of a bill of this kind.

The gentleman from Arkansas criticized the peril-point theory when he addressed the Committee this afternoon. He said that the Tariff Commission could not study 400 individual items. Mr. Chairman, if the Tariff Commission cannot do so, how, pray heaven, can the State Department do so? I certainly would rather trust the Tariff Commission with its staff of experts, with its experience in this field over the years to do the job in a limited time, than I would the State Department.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL].

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman from Wisconsin will listen closly to what I have to say, for I agree with him in part that there has not been much discussion directed toward the issues that the minority has raised; but I should like to suggest to him that the majority of the committee and the majority Members of this House are not opposed to the peril-point system, the majority Members are not opposed to the escape-clause provision. The great difference is one of timing, and if the gentleman will permit me to continue for just a short time I will develop this matter further, then yield to him.

Mr. Chairman, at the outset I ought to clarify the statement that appears in the RECORD here as to where the American Federation of Labor stands. It is true that some Members of the minority attempted to put words in the mouth of the witness, but when he was questioned again the representative of the American Federation of Labor stated that he was in favor of H. R. 1211, that he was not in favor of the amendments which are here submitted by the minority party.

I want to join with the gentleman from Wisconsin in discussing what I consider to be the real issues in this debate. The minority party says: "We favor the extension rather than repeal of the Trade Agreements Act." So I assume now all of the Republicans have accepted the principal of the reciprocal-trade-agreements program. However, it is stated in the minority report that, "We desire to modify this in two respects." It is toward that end I desire to direct my remarks.

First of all, may I say the peril-point amendment that will be submitted tomorrow is one involving a difference of opinion. For one, I believe in the peril-point theory, but I do not agree with your timing. You want to put the peril point into operation before we have had the benefit of experience. Insofar as I am concerned, I want the peril-point theory to operate after we have had the benefit of experience, using the escape clause.

To amplify my remarks I want to call the attention of the Members of this Chamber to a letter addressed to the gentleman from North Carolina, the Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, on May 17, 1948, which I think so clarifies the issue that every argument that has been presented here against it will fall of its own weight. This letter was submitted to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] at the time the Republicans passed the 1948 bill and was submitted by the Chairman of the Tariff Commission in response to a letter written to him by the gentleman from North Carolina. I shall now read for the RECORD the answer of the Chairman of the Tariff Commission. First of all I will put the question of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON]:

Do you think the procedure established by H. R. 6556 would enable the Commission to render a better public service than it now performs?

H. R. 6556 was the Republican measure of 1948.

Here is the response by a member of the Commission which you gentlemen have been eulogizing all afternoon and all through the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee. The Chairman stated:

The Commission was established in 1916 in order that the Congress and the Executive might have a reliable source of objective information on tariff matters, information which could be accepted as authentic by all sides in any tariff controversy.

Continuing, he says:

Thus, from the very beginning its primary function has been to find the facts, leaving policy decisions to the Congress and the President. I doubt the advisability of transforming the Commission into a policy-making agency and thus subjecting it, more than in the past, to political vicissitudes.

My fear is that the attempt to determine the degree to which duties may be reduced without injury to domestic producers or impairment of the national defense would require the making of such difficult and fundamental judgments that the Commission would, in effect, be making major policy decisions. The element of judgment, of course, enters into the various phases of the Commission's present work. This is especially true of the duties which have been assigned to it under the escape clause in trade agreements. In cases under that clause, however, its findings as to whether serious injury to domestic producers has occurred or is threatened will be based upon actual observation of imports and domestic production after the trade-agreement concession in question has come into force. In contrast, the findings required under H. R. 6556 would have to be based to a large extent, especially under present abnormal conditions, on assumptions and estimates as to future probabilities.

I say that the answer of the Chairman of the Tariff Commission is the real difference, and I want the record to show the real difference in the thinking between the majority of the committee and the minority.

The majority viewpoint is that the Tariff Commission, or its representative, should participate, along with other agencies of the executive department, giving facts, advice, and the benefit of its judgment in the negotiation of trade agreements. This has been the policy since the law was first enacted in 1934. The Republicans in 1948 changed that policy by specifically prohibiting this important Commission from giving the benefit of its experience, advice, and judgment to the interdepartmental agencies charged with the formation and negotiation of the reciprocal-trade-agreements program.

The Republicans in 1948 set that important Commission aside in an effort to use it as a political and policy-making instrument for the possible purpose of embarrassing and acting as a block upon the President of the United States. Moreover, under the 1948 act, the Commission was required to give its judgment based not upon actual fact nor upon actual experience, but required as a bipartisan Commission to enter into the field of conjecture, to speculate, if you please, upon what might happen to some industry under certain conditions which might not ever arise. You said, "Give us your idea of what the peril point will be." Now I submit that in any endeavor of life, experience is the best teacher and, in the bill which you have before you today for consideration, requires the Tariff Commission to function as it has for many years past. We want it to return to its former position as a fact-finding body and not a policy-making body. We want to take it away from the political vicissitudes which the Chairman mentioned in his letter to Chairman DOUGHTON. At the same time it ought to be clearly understood, and I believe I am correctly stating the viewpoint of a majority of the committee, we are in favor of the inclusion of an escape clause to be included in every trade agreement hereafter negotiated. There is nothing new in this, for the history of trade agreements since 1942 indicates that has been the policy of the State Department.

Further than that, the policy of the State Department has been ratified and confirmed by the President of the United States in his Executive order issued in the early part of 1948, and which is in effect at the present time. This is the policy that is followed in all trade agreements now. But does this satisfy my Republican friends. Most certainly not, for tomorrow they will advocate an amendment to the present bill making it mandatory upon those charged with the negotiation of trade agreements, the people to whom we have delegated our authority, making it mandatory upon them to negotiate and renegotiate agreements which have heretofore been agreed upon but do not include the escape clause. I submit to you that such an amendment is not timely nor wise and it is not good business judgment to compel those who are negotiating trade agreements to be handcuffed by such an inflexible policy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. CARROLL. I am indebted to the gentleman from Wisconsin for raising the fundamental issues which will be made tomorrow as the bill is read. As a matter of fact, only this afternoon I discussed this matter with a gentleman in the State Department. That is one of the reasons I take your time this evening to put this in the RECORD, so perhaps the Swiss themselves will read the RECORD. I am one of those who believe that the Swiss ought to, out of good faith, agree to immediate negotiation of an escape clause in the Swiss agreement.

It is my understanding that all efforts will be directed by the State Department toward that end. But I am not going to vote to put into legislation a mandatory provision which will handcuff our bargainers.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARROLL. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Let us start working backwards. There are a number of things the gentleman has covered about which I want to inquire.

Mr. CARROLL. I cannot yield too much of my time. I am limited.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I should like to inquire about the escape clause provision. If the gentleman believes the escape clause provision is sound, why does he have objection to inserting it in all trade agreements?

Mr. CARROLL. I think the gentleman misconstrues my position. While I speak only for myself, I think it is the viewpoint of the majority members of the committee. Every person now, in the light of experience, is in favor of an escape clause in all trade agreements, and that has been the policy of the State Department; it is now the policy of the President of the United States, by Executive order, so it is now the policy of this Government, and such a clause will be in all future trade agreements. The gentleman knows that in all the agreements negotiated at Geneva, in every single one of those multilateral agreements, was included the escape clause.

The gentleman asks, why do I object? I thought I stated it very simply. I say it is not good for the Congress to amend this bill to handcuff your negotiators, because you put them in a position that is not flexible enough.

Let me give you one illustration. As a new member of this committee I have been trying to follow through with some consistency, with some desire for understanding, the problems which affect the American watch industry. I was very much impressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DONOHUE] who made such a brilliant presentation in behalf of the people of his district. I have been trying to find out if there is not some way to help the people of Waltham. I find that if you amend this bill and create a mandatory situation there is a possibility—and I did not learn that until this afternoon—that the Swiss might come in, if we renegotiate under a mandatory provision of this law—I did not learn until this afternoon that on the 21-jewel watch movements, actually the present tariff operates as an embargo. There are many factors that the Members of this Congress cannot know, and, therefore, by general legislative mandatory action it is not good to freeze a situation which ought to remain fluid in the interest of good bargaining.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. What the gentleman is really trying to say is that in view of the fact that the proposal to incorporate escape clauses in all agreements is a Republican motion to amend a Democratic bill, therefore, it is bad.

Mr. CARROLL. No. I have tried to make my position very clear. I am trying to make a fair presentation. If you want to make this a partisan discussion, I say to you, based upon my experience in the last session, and based upon the experience I have had now, I believe the arguments presented by the minority here are specious. I believe the great majority of your group are not in favor of the reciprocal-trade program. I think you are using this as a device to emasculate it. That is what I really believe. You asked me my opinion, and I give it to you for what it is worth.

I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Certainly the escape clause provision is not any product of the Republicans. It was voluntarily established by the administration administering the program.

Mr. CARROLL. May I say to the gentleman from Tennessee, when I heard of this discussion about Communists and Communist writings in these trade agreements, I found that the State Department, itself, was the one that instituted the escape clause provision for the protection of American industry and it was the President of the United States who later carried it into effect by Executive order. I think then the issue is pretty clear on the question of the peril point. We on the Democratic side are anxious to protect American industry. Let us take a look at the logic of our position. If the Tariff Commission is to function, it will function best under the escape clause theory. It will function best when it has the evidence upon which to act, the facts and experience upon which to render judgment. In the event of damage or injury to American industry we may use the Tariff Commission through the escape-clause proviso in three ways. First, a complaint from an industry; second, an investigation initiated by the Tariff Commission itself; and, third, the President of the United States may call upon the Commission for guidance.

Labor, the A. F. of L. and CIO, the workingmen, and the farmers of the Nation want this program. Why? Because labor knows that if they are going to have high living standards, they must have full employment. We on the Committee on Ways and Means know that if we are going to get revenue to have a foreign-policy program, the Nation must have full employment. We have to have people making money so that we can get revenue to carry on the foreign program in the interest of peace. We cannot be appropriating five and six billion dollars in support of our foreign policy unless we have full employment. Labor knows that this sort of program will stimulate the flow of goods in international trade. It is my hope that the majority party members will reject overwhelmingly the two amendments which will be offered on the floor tomorrow as indicated by the minority report.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of the Reciprocal Trade Treaties has always been intriguing to me. I have always hoped that I would live long enough to see it operate south of the Mason and Dixon's line as well as north of it. The Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act is a fine instrument for the peanut-growers of the South. Oh, they love it. Yes, because they have a 7-cent duty on peanuts, which, incidentally, is more than 100 percent ad valorem and more than the product ever brought for 25 years in any year before the war. They also like it as was brought out here with reference to sugar. They have not changed the Smoot-Hawley tax on sugar. They like that down in Louisiana. They also like it on the rice.

Then we get into the cotton business. Oh, that is a real one. Oh, surely. Oh, we just believe in reciprocity and the good neighbor policy, and now the distinguished chairman of the committee is getting the Golden Rule in on it. We will not have any of these bad tariffs. What we will do, we will just put an embargo on it and say you cannot import cotton. You tell me any commodity that the Republican Party ever put an embargo on in the United States. I know you can't do it. An embargo was put on so that one could bring in only 135,000 bales of cotton while we produce 10 or 12 million bales a year.

They were not satisfied with that. The long-staple cotton fellows wanted to get in it. So they got Mr. Truman to put a quota on that too. This one is not quite so much of an embargo.

Then we will take wheat out in Colorado and down in Texas. Oh, sure. We are for reciprocal-trade agreements. We must have this good neighbor policy. We must have this Golden Rule, but we will put an embargo on wheat. Only 800,000 bushels of wheat can come into the United States out of over a billion bushels produced here. Such hypocrisy. When it comes to talking about looking after the people in your own district, I do not make any excuses for saying that in the short time I have been here I have figured out that I had better be looking after them, because I do not see anybody in the New Deal who would look after them and I have not seen anybody in the Fair Deal who is going to look after them.

But going back to this tobacco seed proposition. That is a honey. Oh, we believe in reciprocity. Oh, we believe in the good-neighbor policy. Oh, we believe in the Golden Rule. Under this set-up, I guess the Golden Rule means, "Do all you can for the big fellows and let the little fellows take care of themselves."

We passed the most vicious, the most serious trade barrier ever erected in the history of this country. I will yield at this time to anybody who will tell me when the Republicans ever put a trade barrier compared to the act to prohibit the exportation of tobacco seed from this country. I know you cannot show one such thing.

And to think you would have the effrontery to get up here and say the things you are saying today, with the history you have of erecting the worst trade barriers ever erected in the history of the country.

Today I wanted to confine my remarks to just trying to bust a few bubbles floating around here. I have a chart here that shows many things, among which was that when we had these reciprocal-trade treaties during these years we had the biggest agricultural imports we ever had in the history of this country. It shows another thing. It shows that today, with all the talk about what we are doing to the world, we are still importing more agricultural products than we are shipping out of the United States. To put it in less elegant language, we cannot give it away as fast as they are dumping it on to us. Does that mean anything? Are we going to sell out American agriculture so that somebody in Detroit can sell automobiles to somebody down in Timbuktu? That is the way it has worked out. If you like this program, I would like to see you try it south of the Mason and Dixon's line just once. Put it in operation down there. We do not like it. We do not want any more of it. So you help yourselves to it. When you do that, then I will believe that you mean what you say.

This chart shows that this last year we are importing more agricultural products than we are exporting. So you know and I know that what we are trying to do is give away the earnings of the American farmers so that you can sell a few industrial goods.

I really wished to talk to you today about five things that have happened. I do not want to get into a discussion about the wonders or lack of wonders of the reciprocal-trade program. I appeared before your committee and asked you to take the duty off altogether on feed grains in 1943 or 1944. You remember that winter of '43 and '44.

The duty was removed. I am not embarrassed, never having voted for the Smoot-Hawley tariff or against it, and I do not think the Smoot-Hawley tariff has much to do with anything we are discussing here today; nor do I really believe that the reciprocal treaty program does. The reason I say that is that many things have happened in the last 15 years. Let us stop and consider one, that is, state trading. What effect has state trading had on the economy of the United States? Two or three years ago what happened? The Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Wallace, sent a delegation over to Russia. I am not just saying this here to you today, this is in a printed report before the Committee on Agriculture. In this report a man from the Department of Commerce made the statement the United States asked Russia to dump millions of dollars' worth of furs into this country; and today we have the fur farmers of America hanging on the economic ropes. If that is a part of the foreign policy of this administration, then I surely do not subscribe to it. That is point No. 1.

No. 2: The individual producer—I do not care whether he be a farmer or a worker in a factory—when he goes to bed tonight is in danger of having his business ruined by state trading. As good an example of that as I can give you is Mr. Perón. Mr. Perón has the opposite program in connection with his farmers; he buys the products as cheaply as he can and he sells them for whatever he wants to. Mr. Perón can ruin any farm producer in the United States any day he wishes to do so. Although our distinguished chairman does not want me to talk about the cheese business, I advise you that cheese is produced in my district. They are going to lower the duty again on Italian cheese. I do not know what they will pay for Italian cheese, but when Mr. Perón gets done with it he can put all these Italian cheese makers in the United States out of business whenever he wants to. We are talking of state trading. That is No. 1.

Then, to come back to No. 2, we have the United Nations and we have the FAO. I voted for the FAO; as a matter of fact, I voted for the United Nations. The reason I voted for the FAO was because to me the FAO was the instrument whereby we could funnel the surplus agricultural products of this world to the places of the world that need them and we would benefit out of this trading in the long run. I am not talking about the Tariff Commission in connection with this, but I am speaking of agriculture. That is an objective of the FAO. We must safeguard the United Nations and the work which they have done. But how many of you have been down before the Committee on Reciprocity as I have, time after time after time, a hopeless and futile thing? I like to feel when I go before a commission that there is somebody on the commission that has had experience in the field the commission is working in.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield for a question.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Does not the gentleman believe that the welfare of the farmer and the prosperity of the farmer depends upon the welfare of the workingman and the producers in the factories and the mills of the country? In other words, if there is unemployment in this country the farmer suffers more than the industrial worker. If we do not have a large export market then we will have in the industrial areas unemployment, and the farmer himself will be the worst sufferer. That is the way I look at the program anyhow.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. The answer to that is that the gentleman may not live long enough to see agricultural exports equal to imports because ever since the twenties we have been on an importing basis. Way back in the twenties, before we ever had the Smoot-Hawley tariff, we were on an importing basis. Look here at the curves on this graph and see where it begins.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Anyone realizes, and I think the gentleman himself does, that the welfare of the people depends on a high level of employment, and without markets you are not going to get a high level of employment. That leads me right to the third point, that is the minimum wage. If we raise the minimum wage, I do not care whether it is to 75 cents or a dollar, or what figure we put it at, has anyone figured out what it will do to our employment; because if we are going to accept goods from the rest of the world that is not bound by any minimum wage, but goods which are made at as low a wage as the manufacturers can force the laborers to accept, how are we going to protect the American worker against that kind of product? How are we to protect American jobs?

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I think one of the main factors of keeping the American workman employed, that is the industrial worker, is the fact that we will have plenty of manufactured goods to export. If we do not have an export market as an outlet for this surplus of goods that we produce, it will entail more unemployment than the fact of a little bit of imports coming in here. That is the theory.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. The gentleman says a little bit of manufactured goods being imported. I go back to the old story, "Sell out the American farmer so somebody up in Detroit can sell a car to somebody in Timbuktu." That is the circle we are in.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I think the economic history in the last 15 years will show that the farmer has suffered the most whenever our exports were small. When our exports were large and in great amounts the farmer was better off because the worker in the mine, the mill, and the factory, in the cities and in the industrial plants, was employed and therefore able to pay for the farm products a good price. The farmer was more prosperous at that time because of the export business that American industry engaged in.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Of course, the answer to that one is we had 10,000,000 unemployed in 1940 and by 1940 our exports on agricultural products had dropped down to practically nothing, whereas our imports rose and at the time Henry was shooting the little pigs was the time we were bringing in the highest amount in quantity of agricultural products we ever did in the history of our country.

I wish I could spend a longer time on each one of these issues, because to me it is a serious matter. It is something which has to do with the lives of the great bulk of the average people in this country. I do not worry about these Golden Rule fellows, or that chap down in the State Department. I am not worrying about him. You know who I mean. He went over to Geneva last year and fixed up this deal.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Does the gentleman mean Mr. Clayton?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I think he will get along all right. I do not know what is going to happen to the cotton farmers in Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi when Mr. Clayton gets that $7,000,000 farm going out there in California because he can raise many bales of cotton on it.

Mr. REED of New York. He has been doing the same thing down in Mexico. He went down there to teach them how to raise cotton.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. He went down to Mexico, too, but I do not like to bring in personalities.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Did I hear the name of Will Clayton mentioned in the colloquy?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, the gentleman knows he is a great American, he is a sound businessman.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. He must be.

Mr. McCORMACK. He is a very good American.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. He can keep the embargo on so far as cotton coming into the United States is concerned and can keep the American market for his own cotton. Yes, he must be quite a fellow. He seems to do pretty well for Mr. William Clayton. Then we have the price-support program.

We are in difficulty on this support program. In that connection I would like to correct the majority leader, too, if I had the time.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is the gentleman opposed to the support program?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I am sorry the gentleman asked such a question. I regretted when President Truman killed it. I did not want him to kill that program.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is a Democratic measure.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Oh, no.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman says it is somebody else's measure?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Now, be careful.

Mr. McCORMACK. It is not the gentleman's measure, is it?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Oh, no; I would have had a better one and I would not have had it killed like President Truman did.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am sure the gentleman's measures are always better than anyone else's, but let me ask again, he is not opposed to a support program for agriculture?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. How can the gentleman ask such a question?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am sure the gentleman is not.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I was not for the kind of deal that the Fair Deal administration tried to put over in the name of the Aiken bill either.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is now drawing a line of distinction. He is putting himself in the position where his farmers may think he is opposed to it and I do not want the gentleman to get into that position. I want to save my friend from himself. I have a very friendly feeling for the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I will try to save myself.

Now stop and analyze this support program. All major agricultural products that do not have an import embargo on them, like these southern products, or that do not have the protection of the Smoot-Hawley tariff have a world price and a duty that is less than our domestic support price. What are you going to do? Are we going to have an abnormal granary or a normal one? You better start telling the people right now if you think we are going to support prices all over the world. For example, I will show you this chart, as an example of what is happening to our wool. We are supporting the price of wool. Our good friend from Colorado did not say anything against that awhile ago. He kind of likes that protection that his farmers get, because it is in the Aiken bill. They get 42 cents. But we in the Midwest are not sitting so good at the present time. We are trying to iron it out. But, the gentleman has 42 cents on his wool.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. I am sure the gentleman is aware that the wool growers of America can only produce 50 percent, or thereabouts, of the consumption of this Nation.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Can or do.

Mr. CARROLL. We do.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes, but we could if the New Deal had not run around and knocked all these sheep in the head. They killed the sheep off, because they were afraid of what you were going to do with them, and consequently you have not got as many sheep today as we had 50 years ago.

Mr. CARROLL. The gentleman's argument is that the Government destroyed the sheep and that is why we have not more wool.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mordecai Ezekiel went all over the country and said we should not raise sheep.

Mr. CARROLL. There was some testimony which came before the committee, some gentleman from Massachusetts, who was objecting to woolens coming into the country; that the tariff on them was too low.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. That is right.

Mr. CARROLL. But, they said they were imposing a double penalty because the tariff on wool was too high. The gentleman knows that Australian wool comes in here in great amounts.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. A friend from Boston came down here, and he did not like the 42 cents that the Aiken bill gave the wool grower.

Mr. CARROLL. But the gentleman knows that the production of wool in this country is not sufficient to meet the demands of the consumers.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. It is not, but I say it could be.

Mr. CARROLL. At the present time it is not sufficient.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. No; because we import twice as much as we produce.

Mr. CARROLL. Therefore it is necessary to bring in other wood to keep pace with the demand.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. We will not have anything produced in this country pretty soon if you fellows stay in power.

Mr. CARROLL. Oh, the gentleman made that argument in November.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. But I did not do so badly. The people were pretty good to me. I told them the truth. I did not tell them falsehoods and bedtime stories. There are 600,000,000 pounds of wool imported and only 300,000,000 pounds produced in the United States and we have to support 900,000,000 pounds in this program from here on in.

We are going to be in one awful mess if we are going to support all the agricultural products in the world, because as I showed you on this chart, even at this hour we cannot give it away as fast as they are bringing it in here. For the fellow that has any respect for the United States Treasury, if we are going to keep the country anywhere near solvent, my position is that somebody has got to do something about those imports. Then we have the Marshall plan that I also voted for so I cannot blame anybody else that did, but we have to watch out in the Marshall plan that we do not subsidize the people, the farmers, the men in the factory, and subsidize their production, and then lower the duties here and bring other products into the United States. If I had the time, I could give you a very good example of just exactly that, where we have sent millions and millions of pounds and bushels of feed to a certain country, and they are sending their products into the United States and asking for a lower duty so that they can get more and more into the United States. When you take into consideration all those factors, I say first that those European countries should lower their own trade barriers between themselves, and then let us start, because you know how that is, if a chicken flies across the line over there and they want to shoot somebody about it, let them get their own house in order first; let them remove their own trade barriers, and my hope is that they are attempting to do it. Benelux, as I say, is an example, but before they ask us to give our markets to them, they have to first of all feel that their obligation is to get their own house in order.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HAYS].

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I believe that a large majority of the people of this country favor the reciprocal-trade-agreements program as such, and believe that the President's authority to make concessions should be extended. The basic issue before this Congress is the precise form in which such continued authority should be granted. As the elected representatives of the people, bound by oath and solemn duty to watch over the welfare, we must scrutinize with great care any change requested in the terms of that granted authority, to be sure it does not plunge our constituents into a morass of difficulties far beyond any benefits it may bring to them.

The last Congress enacted a provision under which the President was, in effect, required to notify the United States Tariff Commission as to the commodities for which he intended to negotiate for reciprocal reduction of tariff and other trade barriers. Upon receipt of such notification the Tariff Commission was required to conduct hearings and to make an investigation to determine the point to which duties could be reduced without seriously injuring the domestic industry. Within 120 days after the notification the Commission was required to inform the President as to its findings.

The so-called peril points so established by the Commission were solely for the information of the President, and did not restrict him in any way in the granting of concessions. He was specifically permitted to disregard the peril points and to grant concessions below such points if he felt that the concessions to be gained from foreign countries, and other circumstances, made it advisable to do so. The only proviso was that he was required to report to Congress any concessions granted by him which were below the peril point recommended by the Tariff Commission, together with his reasons for doing so.

The President has now requested that this entire peril-point procedure be eliminated and the bill, H. R. 1211, now under consideration complies with this request. Before acceding to this request, it is highly proper for us to examine into the reasons for it. Congress has a great responsibility to the people of this country to make certain that any delegation of its powers over tariff matters is properly administered, and we cannot, without completely disregarding this responsibility, lightly issue to any President or any administrative body a blank check without at least inquiring into the question of what use is to be made of such blank check.

In negotiating trade agreements the President acts through the State Department and it may be safely assumed that the President's request emanated from, or at least meets the unqualified approval of, the State Department. It is thus highly pertinent to inquire into the State Department's official explanation of the reasons for the President's desire for elimination of the peril-point procedure.

This explanation was made by Mr. Willard L. Thorp, Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, at the hearing conducted by the Ways and Means Committee of the House. Mr. Thorp stated that such peril points would be set without regard to any national or international considerations, and would disregard benefits to be obtained by other countries, long-term needs of the economy for expanding markets, the necessity of obtaining the best possible use of domestic resources, possible strategic considerations, or the possible repercussions of our action upon the policies of other countries toward us.

He further stated that the peril-point procedure returns to the old protective theory that only the prosperity of an individual industry is affected by a tariff or a quota, and practically makes such narrow protectionism the sole criterion for determining the concessions which may be made by the United States in trade agreements.

In order that the basic explanation may become apparent, let us analyze Mr. Thorp's statement. In effect he says that the peril points established by the Tariff Commission do not take into consideration all of the factors which must be considered in making trade concessions. He then concludes that the establishment of these peril points practically makes the prosperity of individual industries the sole criterion for determining the concessions which may be made by the United States in trade agreements.

While it may be granted that in establishing peril points the Tariff Commission is primarily concerned with protection of domestic industries, Mr. Thorp's conclusion does not necessarily follow. If the President and through him the State Department, were bound by the peril points and could not grant concessions below such points when other considerations warranted such action, then Mr. Thorp's conclusion would be correct. However, that is not the situation. The State Department is not bound by such peril points and is specifically permitted to disregard them when other considerations, such as those mentioned by Mr. Thorp, indicate a need for such action.

There is no question in my mind that Mr. Thorp is correct in stating that benefits to be obtained by other countries, long-term needs of the economy for expanding markets, and so forth, are factors which must be taken into consideration in determining what concessions should be granted. However, I feel very strongly that protection of domestic industries is at least one other factor which should be considered. The peril-point procedure is designed solely to bring the needs of domestic industries to the attention of the President and to the State Department so that such needs may be weighed in the light of other considerations.

By demanding the elimination of the peril-point procedure, the State Department has in effect said, "We do not want to know the needs of individual domestic industries. We do not want to be told that if we grant a certain concession the effect will be to injure an individual domestic industry. We want to make our decisions without being influenced by any such considerations."

In other words, the State Department wants authority from this Congress to grant trade concessions without any regard to the effect which such trade concessions will have on domestic industry. It wants to close its eyes and ears to any information which would demonstrate the effect on domestic industry. This fact is further illustrated by the effort which has been made to rush this bill through this Congress. The present authority does not expire until June 30, 1949, and yet we are told that it is imperative that the extension be passed immediately. We are not given time to carefully consider the bill or to assemble the information which we should have before acting upon such an important measure, but are told that we must act now, merely because the State Department has demanded it.

Frankly, the only conclusion I can reach as to the reason for such pressure is that the State Department wants a complete free hand in connection with the pending trade negotiations to be held in Geneva in April. It wants to be able to grant concessions during the course of such negotiations without any regard for the effect on American industry.

Perhaps I am being unduly suspicious. However, anytime I am told that the department charged with the responsibility of making decisions which may affect the livelihood of countless thousands of American citizens, does not even want to receive the advice of a nonpartisan body, like the Tariff Commission, which was set up for the express purpose of compiling the pertinent facts and figures, I am suspicious, and it will take a lot to convince me that my suspicions are unfounded. We may be told that under the proposed bill the State Department will receive the advice of the Commission since section 5 instructs the President to seek such advice before concluding any agreement. This is quite true, but it does not explain why the State Department is unwilling to have the Commission make a real investigation and determine peril points. Unless the Commission conducts hearings and makes the investigations now required, it will not be in a position to advise the State Department fully as to the needs of domestic industries affected.

I can see no possible explanation for the State Department's demand, made through the President, other than that he wants blanket authority immediately to grant concessions in the Geneva negotiations in April without giving any consideration to the possible injury to domestic industries, and without having to explain to anyone the reasons for such concessions.

I feel that it is the responsibility of this Congress to make certain that adequate consideration is given to all factors, and that one of the most important of those factors is the effect on domestic industry. While I am completely sympathetic to the importance of encouraging the importation of foreign merchandise in order to improve the living standards abroad and to enhance the purchasing power of foreign countries, I do not feel that we should completely disregard the effect which such importations will have on domestic industries. Our first responsibility is to the people of this country and my responsibility is to the working men and women of my district, and we cannot ignore that responsibility.

At this point I will give you a concrete example of what gives me concern in the administration of the trade-agreements program. In my district are located a number of plants engaged in the manufacture of pottery and chinaware. They employ thousands of workers who depend upon this employment for a livelihood.

Before the last war imports of china and earthenware were very heavy, amounting to 35 to 40 percent of total consumption in the United States, in terms of number of pieces. During the war imports declined very sharply. Production in this country increased. Since 1946 imports began to increase. In that year imports of chinaware amounted to 198,000 dozen pieces, valued at $1,600,000 on the basis of foreign valuation. In 1948, through November, the quantity imported rose to 1,747,000 dozen pieces, or almost ten to one compared with 1946. Value of the imports went up to $6,202,000, representing an increase of nearly three to one.

In 1948 imports from Japan and Germany have shown the sharpest increase. In 1947 Japan sent us 205,000 dozen pieces of china, household, and tableware. In 1948, through November, this quantity had increased to 926,000 dozen. Germany sent us 118,000 dozen pieces in all of 1947 and 429,000 dozen in the first 11 months of 1948. In both instances the increase in value between the 2 years was even more striking. Together, Japan and Germany shipped us over $3,300,000 worth of chinaware in the first 11 months of 1948. In both cases the trend of imports was still distinctly upward.

If the pottery industry were a giant such as the automobile industry, imports of this magnitude could be contemplated with cool assurance that no threat was implied in them. However, our own production of household china has been estimated at only $10,000,000 for 1948. In other words, imports during the first 11 months of the year amounted to over 60 percent of the domestic production for the entire year.

Other branches of the pottery industry are also affected by a sharp rise in imports. Earthenware imports in 1948 amounted to more than $4,500,000, and imports of pottery artware amounted to approximately $3,500,000. Total pottery imports thus exceeded $14,000,000 in 1948.

Is there any wonder why we want to know where we are headed? The State Department minimizes such results of their action. They point to the escape clause as a remedy. This is a wholly unsatisfactory recourse.

It would be much sounder procedure to gain a better idea beforehand than to await damage that will be difficult to repair. The way to meet this situation is to have a competent agency make adequate investigation before action is taken.

What would we say if the Army or Navy proceeded on the theory that it is better to wait until we are defeated in battle before obtaining as full intelligence reports as possible? Certainly if information is a proper guide to action in all other fields of human endeavor, this also applies to cutting the tariff, unless it is assumed that the welfare of industry and its employees is of no importance.

We have another example of how little the State Department is concerned with our industrial welfare, including the standard of living of our workers. This very day Czechoslovakia, which went under Russian control a year ago, enjoys the benefit of a trade agreement with us. During the first 11 months of 1948 we imported $475,000 of table and art glassware from Czechoslovakia.

This was more than we imported from any other country—nearly twice as much as we imported from Italy, Germany, and Japan combined. The entire glass industry of Czechoslovakia has been nationalized. By helping Czechoslovakia we give economic support to the countries behind the iron curtain, and we do this at the expense of employment in our own factories.

It is for these and similar reasons that I am not satisfied to rest the administration of the trade-agreements program wholly in the hands of the State Department. That Department has a legitimate and proper place in the program. We must look to it for all contacts and negotiations with foreign powers; but that does not mean that it should have a free hand to do as it pleases without guidance from the legislative branch in matters for which Congress is directly responsible to the people.

The most effective way of assuring this lies in lodging with the Tariff Commission the power to give authoritative guidance to the State Department on the basis of studies and investigations. With proper liaison between these two agencies, while maintaining the independence of the Commission, we could face with greater confidence the future course of the trade-agreements program.

The facts I have just given you in connection with the pottery industry are the facts about which the State Department wishes no information when negotiations are carried on next April at Geneva and thereafter until June 12, 1951. They are the facts which the Tariff Commission would consider in establishing peril points under the provision in the existing law, and the State Department has said that it does not want to know what those peril points are. I do not think the State Department or the President should be permitted to be without this information, or to ignore it when they have it. I think they should be required to consider the effect on American industry, along with other factors involved, and if they then decide to make concessions which may jeopardize the future of an American industry, the responsibility is on the President, and he should be required to explain the reasons to Congress.

We are entitled to know the facts. If an American industry is to be jeopardized in order to provide a market for foreign goods, or to provide a foreign market for the goods of other domestic industries, we are entitled to know the considerations which prompted the concessions which bring about such a result. We were elected for the purpose of representing the people who will be affected, and we are the ones who are going to have to explain the reasons why it was necessary to destroy the industries which have provided their livelihoods.

Why the State Department is unwilling to furnish us with the reasons I cannot understand. Perhaps they feel that in 4 years all will be forgotten and forgiven. It may be possible that people who are thrown out of their jobs as a result of concessions granted by the State Department next April, may have been able to get other jobs and be willing to forget and forgive 4 years from now, but I seriously doubt that they will have forgotten or forgiven 2 years from now when you and I are called to account.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, the pottery workers—those splendid craftsmen who produce chinaware—in the southern and eastern sections of my State of Ohio to whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON] adverted as being jobless because of the import of dishes from England—are employees of pottery manufacturers who have been operating highly profitable businesses during the past 14 years. These workingmen are my constituents. An overwhelming majority of them gave to the President of the United States and to me as candidate for Congressman at Large their votes last November, and I am serving this fine constituency and the people of this Nation with fidelity and zeal when I urge the passage of this bill. These workers were jobless and these potteries were closed back in 1932 following the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley prohibitive tariff which had stifled international trade and paralyzed our commerce.

Mr. Chairman, may I now explain briefly, just why the administration opposes the present legislation passed by the Eightieth Congress last June, and why it is considered imperative that the original Trade Agreements Act, in operation since 1934, should be restored in its entirety.

The Trade Agreements Act of 1934, fathered by this Nation's former great Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, one of this Nation's most farsighted and greatest statemen, is a tried and tested piece of legislation. It has been subjected to the anvil of public criticism for 14 years. It has been renewed in almost its original form four successive times. Only in 1945 was an important modification made in the original act and that was to provide a different base year upon which changes in tariff rates could be made. No significant procedural changes have been found necessary in all these years provided, and this is an important proviso, provided there is agreement on the basic purpose of the act.

Last year, and let no one misunderstand this, last year, there was no agreement on the basic purpose of the act. There was disagreement. Procedural changes were introduced, not for procedural reasons, but because the authors of the procedural changes were not in agreement with the basic underlying philosophy of the trade-agreements program. They sought through the introduction of procedural changes to alter and deflect the operation of the entire program—their protests to the contrary notwithstanding.

They did not attack the program and the act head on. They masterminded a flank attack under the guise of procedural amendments. These innocent appearing changes in procedure fooled a lot of people because they seemed so plausible and so innocuous. The only way the true significance of these changes could be quickly evaluated was to examine the records of the authors—records that indicated consistent and bitter opposition to the trade agreements program for fourteen long years.

The purpose of the Trade Agreements Act is to expand the international trade of both the United States and other countries. The act has been the cornerstone of our economic foreign policy. It is the legal authority for the trade-agreement program and is continuing evidence of the determination of the United States to contribute its full share to the reconstruction of a sound and growing world economy as the basis for permanent peace.

Mr. Chairman, a Republican majority, now a minority, did not further the expansion of international trade by introducing procedural restrictions into the basic law which is the keystone of our economic foreign policy. Mr. Chairman, you will agree that we did not strengthen the trade-agreements program by limiting the extension of the act to 1 year rather than the customary 3 years. On the contrary, last spring we weakened the trade-agreements program and we loaded the act with a lot of unnecessary restrictions—totally and absolutely unnecessary. These restrictions are today hampering the very people to whom we delegated the job of expanding our foreign trade and who are about to conduct negotiations with other countries looking to the reduction of trade barriers. It does not make sense.

Let us look at these new restrictions foisted upon our people last year by a protectionist minority and which we would like to eliminate and which we will eliminate by the passage of the pending bill.

The extension was only for 1 year compared with 3 years as was the case in the past. This makes foreign countries feel that we are vacillating, are not sure of the policy ourselves, and do not mean business.

It also makes other countries dubious about our efforts under the Economic Cooperation Act to get them to reduce their own tariff barriers against each other. The Economic Cooperation Act, section 115 (b) (3)—approved by both Republicans and Democrats in the Eightieth Congress—requires each ERP country, as a condition of obtaining aid from the United States, to conclude an agreement with the United States, under which it pledges its efforts toward cooperating with other participating countries in facilitating and stimulating an increasing interchange of goods and services among the participating countries and with other countries and cooperating to reduce barriers to trade among themselves and with other countries.

The present trade agreement law, which we are preparing to change, permits the United States Tariff Commission to supply statistics and facts to the State Department and the other agencies which must make the decision on trade agreements, but it specifically forbids the Tariff Commission from giving advice. This is a serious defect because the Tariff Commission with its accumulated knowledge of tariff matters acquired since 1916 and with its bipartisan complexion—three Republicans and three Democratic Commissioners—is able to give very good advice. The Tariff Commission was a vital part of the entire interdepartmental machinery in the 14 years prior to June 1948.

Instead of advice, the Tariff Commission is directed to report to the President within 120 days on each item upon which the United States contemplates tariff negotiations. It is required to estimate in advance the exact point beyond which tariff cuts might cause or threaten injury to a domestic industry.

Because there is no scientific method of ascertaining such a hypothetical point which would hold true for 1 year, let alone 5 years, the Tariff Commission is forced to bend over backward in the direction of caution. No calculated risk can be taken. The effect, of course, is what the authors wanted, protectionist to the extreme.

The present law permits the President to go further than the Tariff Commission's so-called peril points, but if he does so he must give his reasons to Congress within 30 days. Let us not fool ourselves. This means as a practical matter that the limits set by the Tariff Commission are the controlling factors and the last say in tariff negotiations regardless of the viewpoints of other agencies.

The Tariff Commission cannot take account of the interests of our exporting industries in coming to its decision. The Commission cannot take account of the interests of consumers and the interests of industries using imported raw materials in coming to its decision. The Commission cannot even take into account the interests of the United States economy as a whole. No, the only factor to be taken into account by the Tariff Commission is the protection of domestic producers against threatened—not actual, but threatened—injury.

The so-called peril-point system is not only an impediment to the coming tariff negotiations but it is completely unnecessary. Every trade agreement negotiated by the United States in the last 6 years has contained an escape clause which specifically states that if after a tariff cut is made it results in abnormal imports that cause or threaten injury to domestic producers, the Tariff Commission shall investigate such cases, report to the President, and the President may withdraw the tariff concession without even having, in critical cases, to consult with or obtain the consent of the other parties to the agreement.

The advantage of this escape clause is that it can be utilized when injury is a fact or about to become a fact. It does not prevent concessions from being made, or an entire agreement from being made, because 10 years from now injury might be threatened by a rate which is cut today.

In all the 14 years of the operation of the trade agreements program the fear has been constantly expressed that modifications in the tariff would bring ruin to this industry and to that industry. No concrete evidence has been put forth to substantiate actual injury but much has been said about the future.

Mr. Chairman, we do not propose to formulate the basic economic foreign policy of this great country of ours upon a foundation of fear. We must and shall take a more positive, a more affirmative position. We shall be prudent like the pioneer who helped build this Nation, but we shall not strangle our future prosperity or the peace of the world because of a refusal to take a carefully calculated risk. We would not be able to look our children or our grandchildren in the eye let alone the people throughout the world who are struggling with poverty and the Circe call of a tyrannical collectivism that promises them the earth.

I hope the membership of this House, realizing the importance of this legislation, will vote affirmatively on the bill as reported from the Ways and Means Committee.

In the interest of a sound national economy and international peace, the State Department should be encouraged to engage in even more vigorous efforts to reduce trade barriers. International trade is not a one-way street.

The method of permitting the State Department to investigate, hear objections from domestic producers and negotiate reciprocal agreements is vastly superior to the politics-ridden, logrolling tariff making Congress has too often indulged in under the old order before 1934. The old system generally resulted in higher and higher barriers because favors were granted to one local interest after another as against the welfare of the Nation as a whole.

One of the greatest advances under the reciprocal policy was made in 1947 when the United States signed an agreement with 22 other nations covering tariff rates on 45,000 items. Then, last year a Republican Congress reversed the whole trend. It extended an emasculated act for only 1 year—to await further attention when the Republicans had taken over both White House and both branches of the Congress.

Under the Republican Smoot-Hawley Act, with the prohibitive tariff of early 1930, our international trade was destroyed. We built a wall around our country and other nations retaliated. Farmers became bankrupt. They could not make enough money to pay interest on their mortgages and to pay their taxes, and city workers were thrown out of employment by the millions. This largely because of the old protectionist doctrine that foreign goods should not be allowed to enter this country if they undersold a domestic producer—no matter whether American consumers benefited or whether foreign consumers were enabled to buy goods other American producers had to export. The old policy of special privilege to a favored few gave no weight to over-all national interest or to trade's effects on international peace.

We must not adhere to the old order. We must not turn back. We must go forward.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE].

Mr. LANE. Mr. Chairman, a meeting of the contracting parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade is scheduled for April 11 at Annency, France.

Therefore, we are being asked to rush through a bill which would extend the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act without proper safeguards.

To promote international trade and cooperation, the Congress is supposed to step aside and permit the State Department to have full freedom of action in this matter.

H. R. 1211 throws all precautions overboard and places the whole American economy at the mercy of the State Department.

I submit that such a blanket delegation of power without check is dangerous. It is a surrender by the Congress of its watchdog functions to an agency of the Government which is not primarily interested in domestic problems and is not prepared to cope with them.

I believe in the theory and the application of reciprocal trade, but not in a reckless fashion. We cannot achieve it overnight without losing our shirts. There is such a thing as being too generous, which leads to bankruptcy.

Why are so many nations concerned about developments within the United States? It is because they recognize us as the steadiest factor in a world economy. If we should falter, they will suffer. Remembering the high and rigid tariffs of another generation which were responsible for contraction of trade leading to global depression, they would have us go to the other extreme of free trade. But I contend that we can go too far and too fast in this direction. Great as our resources are, they are not limitless. If we go on giving and giving and giving we can exhaust ourselves and become absorbed by a world whose general level of economic activity is insufficient.

Reciprocal trade, to work, must be a two-way street. There is no use in helping others unless they will respond by making some effort to help themselves. And not as parasites sucking the lifeblood from our productivity.

There are other and undeveloped markets of the world where they can sell their goods without competing with our own manufacturers on our own home grounds.

We can help these nations with American technical know-how and with genuine loans, but not at the expense of our domestic market. There are raw materials and certain products which we need from them without inviting competition in those goods which we produce in abundance.

Duplication serves no purpose, even in the name of competition, unless both parties are somewhat evenly matched. That is the basis of our concern over monopolies. An American industry, with all its financial strength, its managerial, technical and labor skills, cannot compete with foreign goods which are manufactured at slave wages without some tariff protection. The only other alternatives are:

First. A lowering of the American wage rate and standard of living, which is inconceivable; or Second. An upward revision of wages paid in foreign industries, to put competition on a fair basis.

The latter is the crux of the whole problem, and I maintain that we should make tariff concessions only to those countries which raise the true wages of their industrial workers. Such tariffs should be graded downward to the extent to which such wages approximate those paid in a like industry in this country. In time, we might even work out a transport differential. Then competition would be truly free and fair.

The bill under our consideration ignores such necessities.

In order to comprehend the dangers in H. R. 1211, we must keep in mind the original Trade Agreements Act of 1934 and the present act, which was passed in June of 1948, to extend for 1 year the original act with amendments.

The Trade Agreements Act of 1934 was for the purpose of expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States as a means of assisting in the present emergency in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression, in increasing the purchasing power of the American public, and in establishing and maintaining a better relationship among the various branches of American agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce.

Times have certainly changed since 1934.

We have no national economic depression and there is no surface evidence, at least, that agriculture, industry, mining, and commerce are feuding and fussing with one another.

Under the proposed bill, however, the President may enter into agreements solely for the purpose of expanding foreign markets, even though such agreements result in the practical destruction of existing domestic markets, with a consequent impairment of the American standard of living and a depletion of the purchasing power of the American public.

Existing legislation provides that the Tariff Commission shall determine the peril points beyond which tariff deductions will injure particular American industries and that, if the President disregards these peril points, he must explain to Congress the reasons for his action or inaction.

By inserting this provision, Congress recognized that officials who are preoccupied with our international relations are not the best judges of problems on the home front.

They have not demonstrated that the procedural requirements of the 1948 act are unworkable. In trying to remove present precautions, they indicate a fear of the facts. What other interpretation can be given to the rush tactics employed on this legislation, which is being steam rollered through as a top-priority bill? The present law does not prevent the President from acting in disregard of the findings of the Tariff Commission; it merely provides that when he does so, he must advise the Congress. The proponents of this new measure apparently believe that if the Congress is not given time to get at the facts, the negotiators of trade agreements will be given full and arbitrary power to do as they please. Their sole concern is to expand foreign markets at any cost—even at the sacrifice of some American industries.

Last year, Congress prudently limited the extension of the trade agreements to 1 year, knowing that economic conditions are not fixed and rigid. In the leveling-off period which we are entering, trying to find the balance between inflation and deflation, it is necessary that we give first consideration to the needs of American agriculture and industry. This requires a flexible rather than a dogmatic approach to economic problems. We cannot afford to jettison our textile plants and workers who clothe us for the sake of favored industries who might want to sell out American textiles so that they can fatten on foreign markets.

There are many who oppose the steadily increasing power of our Federal Government. But how about the further centralization of power within the National Government itself? I consider this to be the real danger. The Congress has already delegated too many of its responsibilities to executive agencies. Shall we continue this process to the point where we wash our hands of all responsibility to American industry and American workers? In my book the answer is "No."

I maintain that the United States Tariff Commission, a Government body of nonpartisan character as appointed by Congress, should be the chief agency for such fact finding in foreign trade negotiations. If you decide for the purpose of efficient administration to delegate the power to change trade treaties, such delegation should not be absolute. It must be given only to those whose public duty it is to constantly consider the effect of such proposals on the American industries involved. And they should report frequently to a watch-dog subcommittee of this House.

I represent a district which is the center of woolen and worsted manufacturing in the United States. In the 125,000 population area of greater Lawrence, Mass., over 12,000 people are out of work, and the situation is reminiscent of depression days. And English woolens and worsteds are on sale in Lawrence at prices lower than the same type of goods which are manufactured in the local mills.

This is coincident with the announcement that such goods have been lifted from the rationed list in England, which indicates that they have a sufficient supply for their own use and have a surplus to export.

Perhaps there are some consumers who would be willing to buy goods manufactured in a foreign sweatshop, because they can buy them cheaper, without giving a thought to the fact that they may be putting American textile manufacturers and textile workers out of business.

Again, there may be some American manufacturers and workers who may be short-sighted on this score. As long as they can do a little international log-rolling with foreign industries and through the medium of governments, they care not about those American industries such as textiles which are lost in the bargaining process.

A point falsely advanced to cover up such manipulations is that some American industries, chiefly those using metals, have no tariff protection. It is claimed that they do not fear imports in their line, even though they pay high wages for short hours. They assert that their productive skill will more than offset imports which are manufactured at low wages abroad.

The real point is, however, that foreign nations are not producing such goods in quantity and must import them from the United States. Incidentally, such types of metal goods as machinery will enable those foreign countries to become active competitors, with a definite low-wage advantage in the American domestic market.

It may sound like heresy to state this, but in the one field where we consider ourselves supreme—the automotive field—we note a beginning of a reverse trend. Thousands of lower-priced, smaller, and more-economical-to-operate English cars are being sold in this country.

Most of the raw material—wool—of the woolen worsted industry comes from outside the United States. The metal, or nonprotected industries like automobiles and typewriters, get nearly all of their main raw materials from within the United States.

These metal industries are strong supporters of no tariff or low tariff so that they can get dollar exchange in England where they sell their goods. Now this is fine for them, but at a reciprocal sacrifice of American woolens and worsteds which must then meet the unfair competition of English fabrics which are manufactured at one-third the labor costs of American goods. And there are many countries which pay lower wages to their textile workers—far lower even than those prevailing in England. Need I mention, for example, the alleged peace price by the Kremlin, the price of which will be a huge gift of machinery from the United States to set up a most formidable slave-wage competitor?

Russia, with modern American-made textile machinery and its slave labor, might sell woolens and worsteds in Detroit at a price with which our manufacturers of the same goods could not compete. The Detroit automobile worker might think he is getting a bargain. But how could he prosper, once this downward chain reaction begins? He would soon find himself out of work for the reason that displaced wollen-worsted workers of the United States, and those dependent on them, would be unable to buy the cars which he produces.

We cannot raise the world-level of prosperity by pulling our own level down.

The only way is to keep our standards high and to make tariff concessions only to those nations which raise their living conditions and only to the degree in which they do so.

Let us export incentives to other countries, but not export the jobs of New England's woolen and worsted workers.

This textile industry, so vital to the American economy and to our national security, has been pushed back to the peril point by the overgenerous concessions of our reciprocal trade policy.

The supporters of H. R. 1211 point to the President's assurance than an escape clause will be incorporated in each trade agreement. I believe that this should be required by law to express the intent not only of the President but of Congress as well. I further believe that it should be so worded as to make it function immediately to protect any American industry which is threatened under a rate prescribed by a trade agreement. The escape clause heretofore used is inadequate. It must be so amended as to be mandatory, with provisions for its immediate and effective enforcement.

The Congress should maintain continuing interest in the manner in which supervision of tariff rates is used or abused. The Tariff Commission is an agency of the Congress, created to help us in our constitutional responsibility of regulating foreign commerce. But our first duty is to represent the people and the industries of our respective districts and to harmonize those interests with the needs of our Federal union.

Having given up to a request that certain of these functions be delegated to the executive branch of the Government, we should not abandon our responsibilities completely. We must insist on hearings and reports from the Tariff Commission, acting jointly with the Committee for Reciprocity Information. And we should require that the Executive report to us directly when he acts contrary to these tariff recommendations. This is our right and our duty.

Gentlemen, I beg you to make these reasonable amendments to H. R. 1211 before our great woolen and worsted industry, among others is bargained into a depression.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman the matter that brings me before the Congress, today, is not new. As a Member of the Seventy-ninth Congress in 1945, and as a rank tyro in legislative procedure I endeavored to establish certain safeguards under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act for some of the major industries of my district and my native State of West Virginia.

Aside from the dubious honor of calling attention to the so-called escape clause in the Mexican agreement of 1945, I failed to obtain any relief. The manner in which this escape clause is being administered in existing reciprocal treaties leads me to wonder if I even won anything—even though the escape clause has been written into all agreements since 1945. I never like to criticize unless I offer constructive substitutes.

While the years subsequent to 1945 have added more gray to my fast-thinning hair, I sincerely hope they have also given me greater information and wisdom with which to plead the cause of these much harassed industries.

What, in the war year of 1945, was described by one of my opponents in debate as a mere skin irritation on our economy bids fair in these postwar years to break out into festering sores that will blight great sections of our industrial life, thereby causing unemployment, reduced purchasing power and destroy the economic well-being of thousands of America's skilled workmen.

Once more I crave your attention while I endeavor to depict not only what is happening to the woodworking, pottery, and hand-made glass industries of our Nation but what is sure to happen to these sorely pressed trades if H. R. 1211, now before you, is approved in its present form.

I am unofficially informed that the State of Oklahoma is greatly worried where State revenues derived from a production or severance tax on oil are dwindling and threaten to hamper governmental operations.

Mr. Chairman, it is clearly apparent to the Members that this protest is not just an isolated instance. Were it not for the apparent haste by which this pending legislation is being rushed through the Congress, I could place in the RECORD scores of instances to show where other of our basic industries are being and will be affected by this legislation.

In formulating a tariff policy, we have to contend with a problem peculiarly our own—the high standard of American life—which, expressed in terms of any money in comparison to an ounce of gold, shows we are willing to pay more for services and merchandise than any other country in the world.

Such a status is an invitation for the rest of the world to sell its goods, produced by means of cheaper labor, in our higher-priced markets, and of necessity, for the protection of our industry and our labor, we must adopt a tariff plan to cope with that situation.

I realize full well that I am treading on somewhat sacred ground—in that my party—the Democratic Party—is pledged to the theory of reciprocal trade agreements as a necessary function in expanding world trade. I, personally, made no such commitments. On the other hand, I stated clearly my determination to defend the interests of my State and district should the demand for continued reciprocal agreements be made in the Eighty-first Congress. I shall not again be misled into supporting any legislation so obviously injurious to my constituents.

One major fault, if I may make bold to suggest, in our tariff making policy is that import duties are based on foreign costs of production and not on American. On foreign standards of value, not our standards.

Our State and Commerce Departments and even our Tariff Commission compile their import data on the basis of import volume and not on a basis of import value. This policy supplies valuable information insofar as statistics go, but it affords no picture of the impact on our economy because it is not "spelled out" on a dollar and cents basis. To avoid these sudden fluctuations in foreign money standards and exchange rates would necessitate rewriting all of our tariff schedules—a huge task—but a task that some future Congress could well undertake.

Before speaking directly to the subject that brings me to the floor of the House I would like to browse around a bit and see how this panacea for all our economic ills is working in industries other than the pottery, woodworking, and hand-made categories. I was much impressed by testimony, given this past week before the House Committee on Education and Labor, of which I have the honor to be a member, by some of the South's outstanding textile producers who complained of competition from Mexico, Chile and Haiti where American capital was used during and since the war to build textile plants that are now exploiting the cheap labor of those nations and making and shipping into this country, under the favorable terms of existing reciprocal trade agreements, both finished and unfinished goods. In one instance men's shirts were being imported but without collars and cuffs. Those necessary appendages were put on after they were past our customs. A glance at paragraph 919 of the Hawley-Smoot Act of 1930 will explain the device used to take advantage of our adjusted rates to comply with the terms of a reciprocal agreement with that particular country.

The operators of the sponge industry in Florida are complaining of the mounting imports of sponges that are being reshipped under the Marshall plan to Germany and the United Kingdom for polishing hand-made china in the pottery plants.

Here is one that should interest my colleagues from Oklahoma and Texas who are just recovering from the solar plexus blow caused by the recent drop of approximately 75 cents per barrel in the price of crude oil. They can find the answer in recent Commerce Department reports on the importation of crude oil from Venezuela and Mexico. Already the impact of 600,000 barrels daily is being felt on the economy in the Red River Valley and on the Osage plains where domestic production is greatly curtailed and in some instances suspended.

Despite our Economic Cooperation Administration program, aimed primarily at rehabilitating war-ravaged western Europe, trade conditions remain unsettled. Already we have seen devaluation and repudiation of the value of money standards in these nations. In other nations, with which we have reciprocal relations, we see total disregard for their treaty obligations. In others, we see import quotas imposed that put American industry at a disadvantage. We cannot escape the observation that those charged directly with the administration of our Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act are lax in enforcement or totally disregard the rights of American commerce through means of the escape clause in existing agreements.

Under our present tariff system there has grown up in this country mass production in many lines of industry. Whether this system is beneficial or not I am not discussing, but it must be apparent that under this system, with our present economic set-up, we will be impotent to provide necessary employment for all returned war veterans and other workers who will be out of employment when the cold-war emergency passes. Particularly will this be true if we sacrifice one American industry in an effort to give other nations buying power to enable them to purchase the exported products of some other American industry. My native State of West Virginia, now the leading glass-producing State in the Union and a large producer of pottery products and clothespins, protests being made the guinea pig for such an experiment.

The present trade agreements do not limit the amounts of any given article that can be imported, and in many cases we have observed that, due to this fact, we are uncertain regarding the quantity a foreign exporter of a given commodity will throw on our markets. Very often as little as 10 percent or less of an imported competitive article ruins the price structure of both the imported and the domestically produced equivalent article.

At present, under the terms of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of 1945 and as amended in 1948, we find deplorable conditions existing in the industries for which I plead. Lack of a backlog of orders or no orders at all has brought unemployment, forced lay-offs or resort to share the work plans. In view of this situation I question the wisdom of the Eighty-first Congress giving a free hand to either our State Department or even to the Tariff Commission any further authority to negotiate probable reductions in tariff rates on the clothespin, pottery or hand-made glassware, crude oil, textiles, shoes and many other industries of the Nation.

The situation, as it affects the glassware and pottery production, is further complicated by the actions of our military authorities in the occupied portions of Germany and Japan and by the Marshall plan administrators in England and Belgium, where millions in American tax dollars have been expended in rebuilding and rehabilitating pottery and glass plants from which the flow of imports threatens to close our American factories. Every effort on my part to get the details as to how many such plants have been rehabilitated and the cost of such work has been met by Army officials with the excuse—"Sorry we do not have the details." It occurs to me Congress might well be interested in knowing these details as a prerequisite to a safe and sane tariff policy.

I have information, the source of which I am not at liberty to disclose, to show that ECA has expended in England alone the sum of $1,250,000 in 1947 and 1948 for rehabilitation of pottery plants alone. Twelve million dollar program under way in Italy. How much of this is Marshall fund money?

Under the favored nations clause, these occupied territories are accorded the same reciprocal treatment as is accorded the other 21 nations party to the Geneva agreement in 1947, one of which nations is Czechoslovakia—behind the iron curtain—where good American dollars used in the purchase of glassware products are going to build up Soviet Russia's economy.

When I pleaded with you in 1945 conditions were bad in both the pottery and glass industry. Only because of the fact the rest of the world was gripped by war were they able to operate, producing ware for domestic consumption. Today their troubles are multiplied by the upward spiraling of foreign imports as other nations resume full production and must find a market in America for their surplus products.

CLOTHESPIN INDUSTRY

I desire to call the attention of the House to the subject of wooden spring clothespins. One of the largest plants making this product is located at Richwood, W. Va., and employs approximately 200 workmen, whose jobs are menaced by a form of competition they are unable to meet because of high production costs.

America is still geared to a wartime economy. Production costs per gross for these pins have mounted, on an average, from 31.4 cents in 1931 to 69.9 cents for bulk and 86.5 cents for packaged goods in 1948. Sweden and Denmark furnish most of the competition. They are responsible for 85 percent of all imports. Compared to our production costs the most recent estimate of production costs in Sweden show they are able to manufacture, pay the ocean freight, insurance, brokerage, and the 10 cents gross import duty and offer these pins for sale at New York for 59.3 cents per gross.

Swedish imports in 1935 were less than 100,000 gross. For the first 11 months in 1948 these imports were 909,865 gross worth $498,611 and are estimated to reach a total for the year of 1,140,000 gross. Figures obtained from our own Commerce Department show Sweden produced, in 1948, a total of 2,500,000 gross in excess of her normal domestic needs. She must find a foreign market for this surplus. One Swedish firm alone is prepared to offer 1,000,000 gross for sale. The price is 47½ cents per gross in lots of 10,000 gross or more.

It is estimated that the normal demand for spring clothespins in the United States is from 3,500,000 to 4,000,000 gross annually. Current average domestic production is at the rate of approximately 400,000 gross per month, or approximately 4,800,000 gross annually. For a variety of reasons current production is not up to capacity. Imports of 1,140,000 gross annually is more than 25 percent of domestic production. Domestic production capacity is more than adequate to supply the normal demand in the United States without importation of any foreign spring clothespins.

Because of high costs of manufacturing in the United States, there is little or no market for American spring clothespins in foreign countries, so that domestic producers are entirely dependent on the domestic market. Total exports during 1948 were less than one-half of 1 percent of domestic production.

In 1931, under the Hawley-Smoot Act, the import duty stood at 20 cents per gross. Today, under the 1945 Reciprocal Trade Act in conformity with the Geneva agreement of 1947, the duty has been reduced to 10 cents. Under the proposal now pending (H. R. 1211) it will be possible for a further reduction downward to 5 cents per gross.

Sweden is listed as one of the 13 nations for further reciprocal trade discussions at a conference to be held in Geneva in April of this year. She is asking for further concessions on clothespins, which if granted will apply to all other nations. If this is done, it will be at the expense of our American economy. I suggest that the Congress consider a restoration of the original 20 cents duty as provided in the original act, rather than permit further reduction of the present 10-cent rate of duty.

HAND-MADE GLASS INDUSTRY

I want to make clear to the Congress that I am not pleading the case of the American manufacturers of window glass and plate glass. It is common knowledge that the four large concerns in this country producing this type of glass have a virtual monopoly on their product through the means of cartel arrangements with Belgian producers which prohibit imports into this country.

United States manufacturers of handmade glassware are fully cognizant of the necessity of stimulating foreign trade. They are not interested in creating tariff barriers just for the purpose of eliminating competition. All they are seeking is the equal opportunity of selling ware made by American workmen at American labor rates as is provided foreign manufacturers using foreign labor at low foreign wage rates.

In 1948 the hand-made glass table, ornamental, and stemware industry in the United States was estimated at $42,000,000. There are 78 companies which employ 35,000 workers. Most of these employees are highly skilled. They are wholly unfitted for work in other industries unless it would be using a pick and shovel.

Most of the plants making this type of ware are located principally in the States of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, New York, New Jersey, Oklahoma, and California, but there are a few plants scattered in other States. The majority of these glass plants are located in small communities and contribute very substantially to the economic life there. Only 10 of these plants are in or near cities of over 50,000 population, while the other 68 support smaller towns, of which 37 are the important industries in their communities of less than 10,000 people. Therefore, in the great majority of these plant locations the very existence of workers and their families, merchants, service business, and the entire area economy depends on the pay rolls and continued operation of these glass plants.

In order to avoid misunderstanding, I wish to state that the large variety of glassware referred to is produced by all known glass-manufacturing methods; that is, first, entirely free hand; second, hand-blown or hand-pressed with the aid of molds; third, by semiautomatic blowing or pressing; and also by, fourth, full-automatic pressing or blowing. In hand plants the principal cost is in highly skilled labor while in automatic machine production expensive machinery and wages of skilled operators and mechanics represent the principal cost of production.

The hand-made glassware industry is in much greater danger from low-cost foreign imports. In spite of this, I have no thought of eliminating foreign competition. I only oppose tariff reductions on hand-made glassware, when the nature and extent of the proposed reduction will make it difficult for an American glass plant to operate with a reasonable profit and to maintain current high wages which our labor is entitled to and now receives. All this industry asks is the opportunity of selling its products in a fair competitive market in which foreign glassware will not have an advantage due solely to the cheap labor by which it is produced.

The Congress must realize the seriousness of the situation when I point to the fact that hand-made glass and artware is only 4 percent of the total domestic production which has a value of $904,000,000. On the other hand, since there are no imports of window glass and plate glass, all of the competition is against hand-made articles, where the imports of $5,556,000 are 13 percent plus of our total domestic production for 1947. Due to our Army and ECA activities this percentage is sure to rise and by the end of the year will reach the prewar level when imports were 23 percent of the domestic production.

It is all the more apparent why these industries need protection when you compare the imports of table and kitchen glassware in 1937 with the imports of 1947. The real story of their plight is found in comparing the imports of 1947 with the first 10 months of 1948 when imports from Sweden, United Kingdom, Belgium, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Italy, and Japan show an alarming upward spiral. A total of 70 percent of all imports of this type of glass comes from Czechoslovakia, the United Kingdom, and Sweden.

Since such a large volume of hand-made glassware could be shipped into this country so soon after the war and during the third year after hostilities ceased, we surely must expect considerably more in the near future, when more normal conditions will exist abroad. I can see no reason why we should share our own domestic markets with central European countries, when, because of our necessarily higher prices we would be prohibited from recapturing elsewhere in the world market this lost domestic-market volume.

The glass-producing countries abroad have always built and expanded their industry for export and not for home consumption. Here in America we have seen a steady growth of the whole glass-producing industry in step with our steadily growing domestic economy. While we have had a greatly increased export business during the recent war years, this can only be of a temporary nature. Particularly exports of hand-made glassware will soon shrink to insignificant low levels as soon as our very limited export markets can be loaded with cheaper products from European factories. Up until now, shipping facilities all over the world have been far from normal. However, steady improvements are being made and to the same extent to which they are made possible, our export volume is shrinking.

The war-torn countries of Europe as well as many other countries in this world which were isolated by the war, are in great need of all kinds of glassware. In some cases glass items are actually so scarce that an emergency exists. It is reasonable to conclude that in these places an abundant market exists for all foreign glass producers. Any increase in volume of their production, by all good reasoning, should go there, and not to the United States of America. It would be well if these countries would lower or even drop their import tariffs in order to attract glass imports.

For the same reason, it is not logical to divert the foreign trade in glassware from those who actually need it, toward our highly competitive markets in America by lowered tariffs and all kinds of special trade agreements. To help with every means at hand to expand the glass industry in Czechoslovakia, Sweden, and many other countries at the expense of our own prosperity is quite illogical to me. With importations at present high levels, foreign credit balances are enabling our competitors abroad to purchase glassmaking machinery and other glass plant equipment which they so urgently need. This in turn will surely make them more competitive than ever before, and only shorten our own chances of survival in an already highly endangered situation.

I cannot agree to a policy of selling out, nor relinquishing our chances to progress, to expand and contribute to the prosperity and future of America. Our State Department officials, who are soon to begin negotiating in Geneva, should most certainly be made aware of the fact that they are about to ruin the future of the handcraft industries in America, if they insist on further lowering tariff rates, and particularly do we desire to have them impressed with the fact that any reduction in tariff rates on hand-made glass items will shortly cause our industry to be face to face with oblivion.

We here in America with our high standard of living, high wages and favorable working conditions can not meet this "cut-throat" competition. Our hourly wage rate in the United States averages $1.42; the rate in Belgium is 31 cents; in France it is 33 cents; in Czechoslovakia, 20 cents; in occupied Germany it is 35 cents; in Japan it is 7 to 10 cents; in the United Kingdom it is 52 cents, and in Italy 24 cents.

So that I might give the Congress a true picture of what faces this particular industry, I have secured from my own personal representative in the area affected some startling facts. Here they are, taken from his communication to me:

You asked me about the condition of the number of plants in your district. It follows:

West Virginia Glass Specialty Co., Weston, W. Va.: Running full but very little backlog and scraping the barrel for new business.

Louie Glass Co., Weston, W. Va.: Opened last Monday, having been closed for 3 weeks because of no backlog or new orders.

Weston Glass Co., Weston, W. Va. Closed.

Lewis County Glass Co., Jane Lew, W. Va.: Opened last Monday after 2 weeks' lay-off because of no orders, and they report no backlog.

C. A. Borchert Glass Co., Weston, W. Va.: Running part time for lack of orders.

Colonial Glass Co., Weston, W. Va.: Running part time.

Mountaineer Glass Co., Weston, W. Va.: Running part time.

Ludwik Glass Co., Glenville, W. Va.: Opened last Monday after a 3-week shut-down because of no orders.

McBride Glass Co., Salem, W. Va.: Closed, no orders.

Mid-Atlantic Glass Co., Ellenboro, W. Va.: Closed, no orders.

Pennsboro Glass Co., Pennsboro, W. Va.: Running slow, part time. No orders.

Reports for other localities in West Virginia and Ohio are that business is very poor. Huntington Glass Co., at Kenova, W. Va., is closed.

On Tuesday of last week I contacted the chief of the United States Employment Service who has offices in the city of Clarksburg. He advised that his unemployed rolls are mounting. More than 2,000 men have been added in the past 30 days. These figures do not include the city of Weston, where hundreds more are idle. In one small town of 2,500 population, where a plant recently closed, 225 men have applied for work.

These startling facts force one to wonder whether now or in future years our Congress would be justified in legalizing reciprocal trade relations with nations in which the living standards, hours and wages and working conditions are so much at variance with the standards we have set up in America.

There now exist four active trade agreements in which the tariff rates on hand-made glassware have been reduced. They are the trade agreement with Sweden, made on August 5, 1935, in which the tariff on glass having a value of $4 or more in the country of origin was cut from 60 to 30 percent; the United Kingdom trade agreement, effective January 1, 1939, in which table and ornamental glassware, cut or engraved, having a value of $1 or more in country of origin, was cut from 60 ad valorem to 45 percent; the Mexican trade agreement, effective January 30, 1943, in which the tariff rate was cut from 60 to 30 percent; and the Geneva agreement of September 1947, which authorized the several reciprocal rates now in effect.

We now face the strong possibility that the glassware industry will suffer even more in the proposed Geneva Conference which is to convene in April of this year. Several of the 13 nations who will attend this conference are asking for further concessions which, if granted, will apply not only to the 13 nations attending the proposed conference, but under the "favored nations clause" the same reduction would automatically apply to the 21 nations that participated in the original Geneva agreement of 1947. This would include all of the major nations now importing hand-made glass, table, and ornamental ware into the United States.

When I appeared before the House as a Member of the Seventy-ninth Congress in 1945, pleading the cause of the hand-glass industry, you were kind enough to protect this industry to the extent that all future reciprocal negotiations affecting imports of hand-made glass from Czechoslovakia were to be predicated on the import duty schedules as contained in the original Hawley-Smoot Act of 1930 and not on the schedules as they appeared in the several Reciprocal Trade Agreements Acts between 1930 and 1945. I sincerely hope that this Congress, in justice to this much harassed industry, will write similar safeguards against the importation of hand-made glassware and decorated-ware articles, not only from Czechoslovakia but from any other nation importing this type of ware that is a participant in any reciprocal agreement. An import quota on a percentage basis is indicated.

POTTERY, TABLEWARE, AND CHINA

Pottery, table, and kitchen articles, used in preparing, serving, and storing food and drink, fall roughly into two groups: Opaque pottery known as earthenware, and translucent pottery known as chinaware. Chinaware is of two types, hotel china and household china. Before the war practically the entire hotel china market in this country was supplied by domestic production, but nearly all the household china was imported. The bulk of the household earthenware consumed in the United States was produced here. Although earthenware imports were substantial, the greater volume of competition with domestic earthenware came from imported chinaware, especially the cheap chinaware imported from Japan. In the 1920's, taking all types and grades together, imports came chiefly from Germany and other central European countries; in the 1930's chiefly from Japan. In both decades, the United Kingdom was the principal source of imports of the expensive grades of household china and earthenware.

Pottery production is technically more efficient—that is, owing to the use of improved mechanical equipment, fewer over-all man-hours are required per unit produced—in the United States than in any other country, although in all countries such efficiency has increased in recent years. So far as costs are concerned, however, the greater efficiency in the United States has continued to be more than offset by the lower wages in the pottery industries in foreign countries.

In 1930 domestic production of household chinaware, porcelain, table, and kitchenware was 160,000 dozen. The estimated 1948 production, based on the first 11 months is 880,000 dozen and for the same year, 1948, estimated imports are 1,768,000 dozen. The domestic production for 1948 has a total value of $9,800,000, while the foreign value of all imports is $6,245,000, which when measured on the American standard of money value would be approximately $12,500,000. Here we face the shocking fact that the value of the imports, measured in American dollars, exceeds the value of all domestic production.

I am particularly alarmed, and this Congress should be alarmed, by the mounting imports of pottery and chinaware products from both Germany and Japan. The Congress will recall my earlier reference to the activities of the Army in rehabilitating and rebuilding Germany and Japan's pottery plants. This action accounts in a large measure for the sudden tripling and quadrupling of imports in recent months. In 1947 Germany imported 118,468 dozen pieces, worth $370,967. For the first 11 months of 1948 Germany imported 427,888 dozen, worth $1,592,708. In 1947 Japan imported 240,994 dozen, worth $414,303 and in the first 11 months of 1948 her imports had skyrocketed to 915,054 dozen, worth $1,755,836. As proof of the statement that most of this dangerous competition is coming from the occupied areas of Germany and Japan, let me call attention to the importations from the United Kingdom which were 182,516 dozen in 1947 and 221,000 dozen for 1948.

Total importations of china dinnerware in 1946 amounted to 203,000 dozen pieces, valued at approximately $1,600,000. In 1947 total imports amounted to 592,000 dozen pieces, valued at $3,200,000. This is up over 100 percent.

In earthenware tableware 1946 imports amounted to 930,000 dozen pieces, valued at $3,000,000; and in 1947 1,175,000 dozen pieces, valued at $4,300,000.

To show the rate of increase during the past year, we find that in the month of October 1947 total imports of china dinnerware amounted to 70,000 dozen and in October 1948 they amounted to 200,000 dozen pieces.

Regarding imports from Japan in comparative periods, we find that during the year 1946 Japan exported to us 67 dozen of decorated china dinnerware. In 1947 she exported to us 214,000 dozen of the same item. In the month of October 1947 Japan exported to us no decorated household earthenware, but in October of 1948 the figure amounted to 28,000 dozen.

Germany's exports to us of china tableware in 1946 were 241 dozen. In 1947 the figure was 131,000 dozen.

In 1937, before there were any restrictions on trade with Japan, she was importing into this country 86 percent of all the dinnerware of all kinds that came to us from all foreign countries. This amounted to close to 40 percent of all the dinnerware that was sold in this country, both domestic and foreign. The prices on the Japanese competing products in our industry were, in many cases, at that time less than one-half of the factory cost for producing comparable articles in American factories. This, you will note, was under the tariff rate of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill of 1930 and before any reductions were made under the recriprocal trading program. The rates that were then in effect have been substantially decreased on certain types of both china and earthenware dinnerware in our trading treaties with Great Britain, Mexico, and Czechoslovakia and under the favored-nations clause Japan would be accorded the same consideration as all countries who were parties to the 1947 Geneva Conference. What future has this industry if Japan is given further advantage under the favored nations clause at Geneva?

I have in my files numerous telegrams and letters from both industry and labor protesting any action that will further endanger their livelihood, and of the estimated 20,000 workers in the pottery industry, based on statistics for 1948, more than 1,000 of these workmen are employed in one of the largest plants located in my home city of Clarksburg.

I submit that when the percentages of imports in any one industry from any one country vary from 300 percent to 400 percent in a space of 2 years, no domestic industry can meet such competition. The protection afforded this industry in the original Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act of 1930—an ad valorem duty of 60 percent—is meager enough and I suggest that this Congress take steps to stabilize rather than to confuse the economic future of these 20,000 workmen. Again an import quota is indicated.

I feel I would be remiss in my duty if I failed to call to the attention of the Congress the growing practice of industrial concerns in this country setting up similar plants abroad for the purpose of getting advantage of lower wage rates and less working restrictions. Many of the finished products of these foreign-owned plants are being imported into the United States and sold in competition with similar American goods and at a lower price. Reciprocal relations on such products should be forbidden regardless of the nation of origin.

In face of the unwarranted action of our War Department in diverting large amounts of its regularly appropriated funds for administration and national defense to the building and rehabilitating of foreign industrial plants, this Congress cannot avoid taking cognizance of the effect on American industries making articles on the reciprocal lists. Neither can the Congress afford to recommend legislation that will legalize trading with the enemy in this cold war between our economy and that of the nations that only last week were collaborating in an effort to destroy our Marshall-plan efforts in western and central Europe.

The avowed course of our Department of State at the approaching Geneva Conference will certainly and only result in the immediate displacement and ultimate unemployment of tens of thousands of America's most highly skilled artisans and craftsmen. Glass, china, kitchenware, clothespins, pottery are but a few of the product classifications slated for possible tariff-rate reductions in Geneva. Truly the matter we here discuss today is a far-reaching and most important one.

The industries I desire to protect are helpless. They have failed to secure State Department assurances that they would not be harmed in the coming Geneva negotiations. I am hopeful that your interest, courtesy, and attention today is evidence of our intention to try to help them. Their very future is in your care. They ask only justice, not charity. I fear that easier and "cheaper" access to our markets can mean only economic ruin to industry and insecurity to the thousands of workmen that will be affected.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman is in favor of the reciprocal-trade-agreements program, as I understand it. It is my understanding that he is up here to get a little special protection for the pottery interests and the chinaware interests in his territory. The matter of the employees is incidental. Generally the country is not of sufficient importance to the gentleman that he is able to go along with a program as envisaged by his party and as presented by the President of the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. I have not stated I was for the program. I did vote for the previous reciprocal trade treaties program.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman in the hearings stated he was for the program generally but insofar as his particular area was concerned he wants something special. I therefore placed him in the category of the special pleader for that reason.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to say also at this time that the first escape clause written in any agreement prior to 1945 was written in a half-hearted manner in the Mexican agreement, the last one drawn prior to the action taken by this Congress in 1945.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. STEED].

Mr. STEED. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the consideration of this bill, I desire to call attention to the fact that the importation of foreign oil is becoming a matter of serious concern to Oklahoma and the oil industry. I am advised that foreign oil imports have increased 150 percent in the last year and that this oil is coming in at the rate of 600,000 barrels daily at the present time.

I also am advised that the surface storage of oil has increased 105,000,000 barrels during the last year and has now reached a point where additional storage is not available.

As a result of this situation, the Oklahoma Corporation Commission, in an order issued in January, curtailed the production of oil in Oklahoma by 40,000 barrels daily. Further curtailment will be necessary if the present rate of foreign importations is continued.

This not only works a hardship upon the oil industry but is beginning to threaten a large portion of the tax structure of the State of Oklahoma. For instance, on the basis of the present price of oil, the January curtailment order caused a loss of about $5,000 a day in Oklahoma tax revenues from its oil production.

Supporting this statement, I have a resolution passed unanimously by the Oklahoma Legislature, which is now in session, and dated January 31. I also have a copy of a resolution passed by the Oklahoma Corporation Commission on January 26 setting out the same facts.

I think it important these facts not only be called to the attention of the department controlling oil imports, but that Congress ought to take them into consideration with a view of limiting such imports to a point where they do not upset or harm one of America's most vital and important industries, and one without which we cannot have national defense.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STAGGERS].

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting since noontime to get in my 2 cents' worth, so I would like to make a few remarks at this time.

I am one of that group that was referred to several times today as "in favor of this bill but," and it has been insinuated that those members represent special interest. If you call representing the people with whom you were born and raised representing special interests, I do represent them. It is my duty and my responsibility as their Congressman to present their views regardless of party affiliation or the walk of life they may represent.

In the Second Congressional District of West Virginia which I represent are located several of the finest hand-made glass industries to be found in the United States. I, as well as many of my constituents believe that the present reciprocal trade bill will seriously impair and endanger their means of livelihood unless their situation is taken into consideration. Not for a moment would I oppose the assumption of world economic leadership by the United States; economic isolationism is dead, and intelligent assistance to our less fortunate sister democracies is in line with our own self-interest. Wisely administered foreign cooperation carries with it a commitment to purchase reasonable quantities of foreign merchandise. Trade is a two-way street and we cannot expect continuously to sell goods and to lend capital abroad unless we are prepared some day to accept payment in the form of people and services.

In my mind and my view that much is elementary economics and plain common sense.

Fear alone is not adequate justification for remedial action. When we fail to recognize those rights and to protect them we might as well say we are behind an iron curtain of our own as far as the rights of the people are concerned; and I am speaking primarily of Czechoslovakia. Continued trade with Czechoslovakia which is located behind the iron curtain now, as we call it, and that primarily is one of the factors that is endangering the hand-made glass industry in my district. With men and women now only on 60 percent of their time I think something should be done. At least I think the treaty with Czechoslovakia should be canceled.

Looked at from such an over-all point of view the problem seems simple. From such a distance imports are a vague concept and no difficulties appear.

But the problem becomes more complicated when we get closer to it. This is a big country which we live in and the interests of one section are quite different from the interests of other sections. Some of our industries are healthy and prosperous and quite able to take care of themselves in world markets without fear of, or favor from, Government. Others are less favorably situated and every so often find themselves imperiled by well-intentioned, but dangerous, acts on the part of Government officials.

Some of us, like myself, who happen to come from districts in which numbers of producers are not able to withstand unrestricted foreign competition find it more difficult than some of our colleagues who represent districts in which there is no such threat from competitive imports.

It so happens that in my district, in West Virginia, a leading industry is the making of hand-blown glassware, tableware and artware. In terms of the economy of the country as a whole this is a small and relatively high-cost, industry. To my constituents, however, its survival and prosperity means their daily existence.

Many years ago the skill of glass blowing was brought to this country from Bohemia. The skill has survived down to this day, notwithstanding severe and growing competition. The lower-priced products find it difficult to compete against the domestically machine-made glassware. The more expensive, decorated ware competes with imports from Sweden and Czechoslovakia.

The Department of State has included the high-priced ware for bargaining with Sweden next April. Such glassware is valued at $8 each abroad and is now dutiable at 30 percent. This is the glassware that retails for $25 or so per piece and represents only a small part of the total output. If it were all that we had to worry about I would not feel as alarmed as I do today.

What troubles me most is the action that has already been taken—at Geneva in 1947—when our delegates signed the so-called general agreement on tariffs and trade. For there the rate was reduced from 60 percent ad valorem to 50 cents per piece with a proviso that the rate is to be not less than 30 percent or more than 50 percent. At present prices the new rate is equal to about 35 percent.

American labor is high-priced labor. For that let us be thankful since it means that, by and large, we are more productive than other lands. It means that we get more real income for our work. I would not advocate that we do anything that would lower the wages of our glassworkers, who receive $1.42 per hour compared to those in Czechoslovakia, who receive about 20 cents per hour. In part, at least, the prevailing high wage rates in the United States are accounted for by large-scale production to satisfy large-scale markets, here and abroad.

We should not be dealing at all with any country that is dominated by Russia, inasmuch as they are not cooperating with us and the money does not go to their working people but to build up the Russian military machine, which is certainly poor policy at the expense of our own people.

But what troubles the workers in my district is whether adequate care is being taken by the administration to make sure that in the cutting of tariff duties they will not be sacrificed unwittingly. The industries in my district have already experienced serious damage from the importation of Czechoslovakian glassware. They are now operating at about 60 percent of capacity. In my opinion this is due to the fact that the duty was cut on this product in Geneva in 1947.

Fear alone is not adequate justification for remedial action. When we fail to recognize those rights and to protect them we might as well say we are behind an iron curtain of our own as far as the rights of the people are concerned.

The national interest, of course, is all-important. But, gentlemen, we are still a democracy, and minorities, thank God, still have rights.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, due to an error, the supplemental statement of Mr. James G. Shennan, president of the Elgin National Watch Co., did not get printed in the committee hearings. For that reason, I would like to extend it into the RECORD at this point.

SUPPLEMENTAL STATEMENT OF THE AMERICAN JEWELED WATCH MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY ON THE BILL (H. R. 1211) TO EXTEND THE TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

This statement supplements the testimony of Mr. James G. Shennan, president of the Elgin National Watch Co., on behalf of the American manufacturers of jeweled watches—Elgin National Watch Co., Hamilton Watch Co., and the trustees of Waltham Watch Company—before the Ways and Means Committee of the United States House of Representatives on January 31, 1949, during the hearings on H. R. 1211 to extend the Trade Agreements Act.

The statement is filed to supply certain information not available to the witness at the time the testimony was given (transcript, p. 1083), and to correct certain inaccuracies in the brief filed, and the testimony given by the witnesses who appeared on behalf of the American Watch Assemblers' Association.

Mr. Shennan was asked to supply information as to the profits of the Elgin and Hamilton companies. The witness supplied the information for his own company, but did not have the comparable information for the Hamilton Co. The information is now available for both of these companies and the Waltham Co., combined, and is as follows:

| Year | Combined sales | Combined net profit | Percent of sales |
| 1940 | $25,857,000 | $2,724,000 | 10.53 |
| 1941 | 33,413,000 | 3,060,000 | 9.16 |
| 1946 | 39,902,000 | 1,950,000 | 4.89 |
| 1947 | 49,131,000 | 1,830,000 | 3.72 |

Mr. Shennan was also asked (transcript, pp. 1089–90) if the representatives of the United States at the forthcoming trade agreement negotiations in Geneva, Switzerland, next April could not "open up this matter of proper protection (tariff), including the inclusion of an escape clause for the watch agreement." In addition to the answer given by the witness at the hearing, it is desired to point out that Switzerland has not, as yet, become a party to the general agreement on tariffs and trade, and is not to be a party to the negotiations in April. Therefore, the Swiss trade agreement, and watches, will not be under review at that time.

The memorandum filed with the committee by the American Watch Assemblers' Association bases most of its argument on the assumption that the American jeweled watch manufacturers desire a quota. Actually, as stated to the committee by Mr. Shennan, the American manufacturers do not desire a quota, they desire only tariff rates which will afford them equality at the border. If this was granted to them, there would be absolutely no difference in the related economic activity which flows from the sale of watches in this country. All of that business, which the importers claim to create, would continue to remain here since the American-made movements require the same labor, the same material, the same services, as imported movements, to complete their manufacture and distribution. The real difference, and the one which is vital to the national defense, is that more facilities for the manufacture of movements, and more people trained in the skills required to make them, would be created and available in the event of another emergency; and it is timepiece movement manufacturing capacity which is essential to the national defense. Even the representatives of the assemblers' association who testified at the hearings conceded that neither they, nor any other industry in this country, could manufacture watches, and by watches they meant time measuring mechanisms.

In this connection it is significant to note that the representative of the Bulova Watch Co., who testified on behalf of the importers, stated that it took from 8 to 10 years before Bulova was able to get its plant at Woodside, Long Island, into production (transcript, p. 1344), and that it took 20 years to get it on a paying basis (transcript, p. 1346). He also stated that producing a watch is far different from producing other things (transcript, p. 1346). The other witness who testified on behalf of the importers stated that it was the intention of his company to manufacture movements in this country, and that they began setting up a pilot plant at Long Island a year ago which is ultimately to be moved to Cincinnati, where they now case their imported movements. But here again the difficulty of getting into movement manufacture is demonstrated by the fact that he also stated that they had not "as yet," after a year's time, made any movements in this country, not even in a pilot-plant operation, let alone on a production basis. This time element is the thing that is so vital to our national defense, and is the thing which gives us on whom the defense agencies are relying in the event of another war so much concern.

The spokesmen for the importers tried to minimize the significance of movement manufacturing in this country by asserting that the importers had also done a considerable amount of defense work during the last war. But in addition to conceding that they made no time measuring movements, only one item was specifically mentioned and that was "an electrical indication measuring instrument" (transcript, p. 1440). It was stated that instruments for ships, planes, and tanks were made by the importers but, aside from the above, no specification of them was given. A further statement was made to the effect that there was an adequate labor pool for defense work in the "watchmakers" being graduated from the various trade schools which could be readily converted to watch-movement manufacture. This completely ignores the fact that the manufacturing facilities are not available even if the statement were correct, and the statement itself is not correct. The training given to students in the watchmaking schools is to prepare them for the work done in the jewelry stores which maintain watch-repair departments. There is no training given in this country to prepare men in watch engineering, watch designing, watch machine building, watch tool and die making, watch manufacturing supervision, which are the critical skills.

The importance of American movement manufacturing facilities was also questioned by indicating that the American manufacturers of movements were all, to some extent, dependent on Swiss parts. With the single exception of jewel bearings the statement is simply not correct, and it should be remembered, jewel bearings were made by this industry during the last war. It is, therefore, not correct to say that the American manufacturers are in any sense dependent on the Swiss.

There was a sharp conflict with respect to the differential in the cost of making movements here, and importing Swiss-made movements. The committee was fortunate to have before it a representative of the Bulova Watch Co. who, although appearing on behalf of the assembler's association, is the treasurer of the one importer who also manufactures movements in this country. However, this witness would not indicate, even on a percentage basis, the difference in movement manufacturing costs between their American and Swiss plants and, as a matter of fact, claimed not to know, although he indicated, from a document on Swiss labor rates to which he made reference, that the top figure in Switzerland was about 60 cents an hour (transcript, p. 1343). If this is true, it more than supports the American industry's statement that the labor rate difference is about 2½ to 1. Nor was the testimony of the other witness for the importer much more specific on either of these points. Not having yet manufactured any movements in this country he was unable to say what his American costs would be, and on labor rates he indicated a 50–60 cents an hour differential (transcript, p. 1443). The schedule of wage rates in the Swiss watch industry is a matter of published information, and is available to anyone. This same witness readily conceded the importance of American movement manufacturing companies to the national defense (transcript, p. 1440). We call attention to this testimony to high light the necessity of determining the actual facts, particularly in view of the national defense importance of the American manufacturers, which is the reason we feel that this committee itself, through a subcommittee, should study the situation. We stand ready to submit audited production cost figures in confidence to such a subcommittee, as well as our labor rates.

In this connection, however, we wish to definitely clarify the assertion that Elgin's costs cannot be as high as was indicated by witnesses for the American manufacturers, because it sells watches at as low a price as $12 net (transcript, p. 1442). The reference was to a watch which retails at $29.75 and which the Elgin company actually sells for $15. It is a 15-jewel watch, whereas the testimony being commented upon related to 17 jewel, higher quality watches. Elgin has only two models at this price, one man's and one lady's, and is selling them at a low margin of profit in order to stay in the low-price category. This is the lowest-priced watch in the Elgin line.

One further comment on the testimony on behalf of the importers would appear to be in order. They blame the present financial difficulties of the Waltham Watch Co. entirely on bad past management. This has been the stock answer of the importers to the fact that there are so few remaining movement manufacturers in this country, and has been asserted time and again before this committee. Obviously, no one reason is the whole answer. Nevertheless, it is apparent to those of us who have actually faced the importer's competitive advantage resulting from lower costs, that this factor is an important reason for the Waltham situation. Some one American company is always going to be the marginal producer, and the status of the industry now is such, from the national-defense considerations, that we cannot afford to lose the facilities of a single manufacturer.

May we reiterate that the American manufacturers of jeweled-watch movements are not suggesting any quota restrictions? We feel confident that with an equalization of cost factors this industry can successfully compete with the importers, which means that it can grow in an expanding economy. It is essential to the national defense that it do this, because it is presently not of sufficient size to meet the minimum requirements of a full-scale emergency. In view of its importance to the national defense, its present size and the competitive situation, and in view of the failure of the industry's efforts over the last 5 years to obtain relief from the agencies administering the trade-agreements program, it seems to us that the situation must be given study on the national policy level, and that this committee of the Congress is the only agency of the Government that is in a position to carefully investigate all phases of the problem.

This is not simply a matter of whether one or two or more business concerns in this country shall remain commercially vigorous. It is that consideration, plus the building of a highly essential defense facility. This is the aspect of the problem which we emphasized in the statement we made at the hearings. It is the aspect of the problem which we feel not only justifies, but necessitates, an investigation of the matter by a congressional committee. It is the reason why we have suggested a special subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee to give it attention.

Respectfully submitted on behalf of:

ELGIN NATIONAL WATCH CO.,
HAMILTON WATCH CO.,
WALTHAM WATCH CO.,
By JAMES G. SHENNAN,
President Elgin National Watch Co.

FEBRUARY 3, 1949.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, there appear to be no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1949."

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. ## MANUFACTURE OF COTTON TEXTILES IN SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BRYSON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, South Carolina, my State, has long since been recognized as the leader of the Nation in the manufacture of cotton textiles. I call your attention to the following newspaper article appearing in the Greenville News on February 7, 1949, from which you will observe South Carolina is also the leader in the consumption and manufacture of other fibers in the textile industry.

In South Carolina we manufacture every kind of textiles—from the most delicate and beautiful patterns of fine dress goods used to make women's garments to heavy woolen materials used for the manufacture of men's suits as well as duck and tarpaulin of unparalleled strength and durability. Time will not permit me to enumerate the thousands of types of textiles we manufacture.

STATE'S SPINDLES TOP NATION IN CONSUMING OTHER FIBERS—DOMINANT POSITION AS COTTON TEXTILE STATE INCREASED

COLUMBIA, February 6.—South Carolina is the Nation's leader in the consumption of fibers other than cotton on cotton-system spindles, Director H. W. Bishop, of the State research, planning, and development board, revealed today.

"The fact that the State's cotton-system spindles and its textile employees have sufficient versatility to produce other yarns is a highly important factor in diversifying textiles," he noted, and added:

"Management has been able to modernize and improve equipment in order to produce yarns without any loss in training new employees.

"Federal Department of Commerce figures for December showed that South Carolina had 498,000 of the entire country's 1,267,000 cotton-system spindles consuming materials other than cotton.

"The State had 39.3 percent of the Nation's total and 9 percent of all the cotton-system spindles in the State were consuming other fibers.

"The high productivity of South Carolina textile employees further is demonstrated by the fact that the State had 42.2 percent of the total spindle-hours for 1948 of cotton-system spindles working on other fibers."

Bishop said the Federal figure showed North Carolina ranked second with 319,000 spindles, followed by the combined New England States with 267,000 and Georgia with 91,000.

"A recent compilation of Federal figures showed South Carolina increased its dominant position as the No. 1 cotton-textile State with 28.39 percent of the Nation's active spindle-hours in 1948," Bishop recalled.

AMERICAN JOINT COMMISSION TO ASSIST IN THE UNIFICATION OF IRELAND

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, during the last Congress I introduced a resolution to provide for the creation of an American Joint Commission to assist in the unification of Ireland. Because of the pressure of other problems it was not possible for the House Committee on Foreign Affairs to give consideration to my resolution. I have therefore again introduced this resolution, which is House Joint Resolution 59 and is now before the House committee, where I hope that hearings will be given and careful consideration devoted to this vital issue, which today clouds the horizon of good will between the peoples of Ireland and Great Britain.

Under the terms of House Joint Resolution 59, the President would be authorized to appoint a commission of 10 members, to be known as the American Joint Commission. This Commission would be authorized to consult with the British Government and its representatives to consider and to recommend an immediate and final settlement of the Irish question leading to the abolition of the border between the north and south of Ireland, and to sign such settlement in behalf of the people of the United States. By the establishment of such a commission, this country would be offering its services to act as a mediator between the Irish and the British in an effort to terminate the arbitrary and useless border which has been imposed upon the Irish countryside and which has served to divide Ireland into two separate countries, when in fact it is and can be only one nation, and served likewise to divide the Irish people and engender bitterness between the Irish and the British nations.

Throughout all Ireland today the demand for the removal of the northern border is constantly growing stronger and stronger. This sentiment in behalf of the unification of all Ireland cannot be ignored. The restoration of the six counties of the north to the bosom of the Irish nation cannot be impeded by propaganda nor prevented by edicts emanating from Sir Basil Brooke or his puppet Government of Northern Ireland. Not even the holding of special elections on February 10 in northern Ireland will in any way slow the demand of the Irish people that their entire country be united once again as a free and independent nation.

The elections in northern Ireland only serve to call the attention of the world to the nefarious scheming by which the Government in the six counties of the north is maintained. The sentiment of the people in the six counties is divided between those who desire union with Britain and those who desire the national unity of all Ireland. By an elaborate system of gerrymandering the boundaries of parliamentary districts, voters favoring British union are given a majority of the seats in the Stormont Parliament. Districts favoring union with all Ireland, in many cases, contain twice as many voters as do adjoining districts which favor British union. In the southwestern corner of northern Ireland, for example, the county of Fermanagh is divided into three parliamentary districts, two of which are partitionist in sentiment and the other antipartitionist. The county as a whole opposes partition by over 5,000 votes, but these votes are all enclosed within one heavily populated district, which votes antipartition by 9,000 votes. The other 2 districts scrape through with about 1,200 and 800 partitionist majorities. The result is that in elections one-half the population of the county elects two British-union candidates, while the other half of the population can only elect one Irish-nationalist member. Thus, here, as elsewhere in the northern six counties, two unionist votes are equal to one Nationalist vote.

In the current elections, hastily called by Sir Basil Brooke in an effort to silence the growing popular demand for unification of Ireland, not only is this system of gerrymandering of districts being employed, but also a 3-year register of voters will be in effect. As a result, those voters who have come of age during the past 3 years will be denied an opportunity to vote, as well as many others, who by change of residence or similar reason, have had their names dropped from the old register. Within 6 weeks after the holding of this election, the new register will become effective, and it is to avoid the possibility that the new register might affect the results in the old gerrymandered districts that this election is being rushed through. Evidently it would not require any very large change of residence on the part of the voters within the three parliamentary districts of Fermanagh County to completely change the results of an election there. The same situation holds forth in Derry City, in Tyrone County and elsewhere.

Throughout Irish history heroic patriots have frequently chosen death or imprisonment rather than submit to loss of their liberty or to foreign domination of their land. That spirit is not dead within the Irish. It never will die. The undemocratic processes of the present elections in Northern Ireland could well become the occasion to enkindle the flame of ardent patriotism within so many Irish hearts as to light the torch of riot and rebellion against the domination of the present government there and against the British subsidization of that government.

It is because this situation exists in Ireland today and will continue to exist as a threat to world peace until the only Irish border is the entire coastline along the sea that I have offered my resolution before this body. The democratic nations of the West cannot long tolerate the existence in their midst of any nation or part of a nation, however small, subject to the outside domination and control of a foreign country. The right of Ireland to freedom and self-determination is just as vital on the international scene as are the rights of Indonesia, of Israel or any other nation. It is in an effort to protect those rights and to eliminate the Irish question at least, that I have offered my resolution.

This Congress is in a position to take the first step in bringing about a new era of friendship and good will between the British and the Irish peoples. With each step won by the Irish in their march toward freedom, the ancient antagonisms and animosities toward Britain have been lessened and to a great extent eliminated. The northern border is the last vital barrier to a complete and full understanding between these two great races. By the passage of my resolution, we will make it possible for Great Britain to enter into negotiations for the elimination of this border in a dignified and gracious manner. The voluntary action of Great Britain, which the passage of my resolution will instigate, will tremendously strengthen the good will between Ireland and Great Britain. On the other hand, should this situation be much longer ignored, then we can anticipate that efforts will be made to force the elimination of the partition of Ireland, and as always, the use of force will leave in its wake a feeling of bitterness and ill-will. So in the interest of international good will and the peaceful arbitration of disputes, I urge the prompt consideration of my resolution both by the Committee of Foreign Affairs as well as by the House itself.

ADJOURNMENT

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1949

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Most Holy God of our salvation, for the glory of Thy name, purge away our sins and endow us with a chastened sense of the liberties of all men.

These are times which try men's souls; minds are perplexed and hearts are sad and heavy. A consecrated servant of a great church has been outrageously judged in the name of a godless state. O bore into the ruthless minds of the leaders the deathless truth, that a nation that sows to the wind shall reap to the whirlwind, and whatsoever it sows, that shall it also reap. Teach them that right, and not might, that Christ, and not Caesar, speaks the final word by which nations live. O continue to work Thy great purpose, and Thine shall be the praise. In the name of a merciful and just Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ANNOUNCEMENT

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make an announcement. Those committees that have consent to sit during the sessions of the House during general debate are not supposed to sit this afternoon, and they have no authority to do so; so I trust that all chairmen of committees will take notice.

FEDERATION OF EUROPE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of talk about a proposed federation of western Europe. There will be some action taken, I presume, very shortly upon the proposed North Atlantic Pact. It is my belief that if we are going to have a federation of Europe—and I think we should—the component parts of that federation should be strong. I am, therefore, today introducing a concurrent resolution in order to encourage the development of a peaceful and prosperous order in Ireland, but with no intention of imposing any particular form of political or economic association upon its people. Under this resolution it will be resolved by the House of Representatives—the Senate concurring—that the Congress favors the political federation of northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. There is no reason why this vexing problem of partition should not be solved so that the Irish Nation can once again become united to the end that Ireland, as a full-fledged republic, can again take its rightful position among the family of nations.

FARM ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 128) to provide that acreage planted to cotton in 1949 shall not be used in computing cotton-acreage allotments for any subsequent year, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference with the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. COOLEY, PACE, POAGE, HOPE, and AUGUST H. ANDRESEN.

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution (H. Res. 80) from the Committee on Armed Services, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary for National Defense is hereby requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish the House of Representatives at such time as may be convenient prior to the adjournment of the present session of Congress such factual information as may be definitely available showing administrative action on the program of preparedness for national defense.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL]. Since a letter from the Secretary contains the information called for in the resolution, and that information has already been sent to the gentleman from New York, I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 313) to amend title 26, United States Code, so as to make the provisions thereof applicable to service personnel, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TEAGUE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous material.

Mr. GRANAHAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter to the Secretary of State from the Catholic War Veterans, protesting against the trial of Josef Cardinal Mindszenty.

Mr. MILLER of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter and a resolution from the water project authority of the State of California.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a very fine editorial from the Cincinnati Post entitled "Trial by Error," and also a very fine editorial from the same newspaper entitled "Our Norwegian Ally."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to register my personal disapproval and indignation at the sham trial and conviction of Cardinal Mindszenty, of Hungary. He is a true man of God, a devout Christian whose only crime has been to preach the religion of Jesus Christ, and he faces life imprisonment only because the tenets of Christianity are incompatible with communism. I wish to publicly state that in my opinion his imprisonment will be an indelible blot on the record of his country and a challenge to Christians everywhere.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

Mr. TAURIELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAURIELLO. Mr. Speaker, as a Member of this Congress, I also want to raise my voice in protest at the infamous and outrageous trial that was just held in Hungary and the conviction and sentence of Cardinal Mindszenty. This trial was a travesty on justice, involving a high dignitary of the church. It is not so much that it happened to be a high dignitary of the Catholic Church, because today it is Cardinal Mindszenty and tomorrow it may be a high dignitary of some other Christian denomination. Certainly this is a challenge to the Christian world. We as Christians should accept this challenge and raise the torch and carry it forward in our fight to eradicate these Godless men who have just completed this outrageous trial. Let us stand up and fight these ungodly forces who are trying to destroy Christianity throughout the world.

I am appending two articles from newspapers of my home city of Buffalo bearing on this very important question:

[From the Buffalo (N. Y.) Courier-Express of February 8, 1949]

COMMUNIST "JUSTICE"

Technically, Cardinal Mindszenty is awaiting the verdict of the Budapest "people's court" trying him on a charge of treason. Actually he is awaiting sentence. A verdict of "guilty" was determined by Hungary's Communist masters before the cardinal's trial began. The only question now is whether a death sentence or one of imprisonment is to be imposed. The choice between the two penalties will be made entirely on political and propaganda grounds, of course, without regard for principles of justice.

There has been much speculation as to how the cardinal's captors induced him to make certain statements at his trial which conflict with his pretrial utterances. There are suggestions of torture, drugging, and even of hypnotism. Whatever the explanation, there is nothing new about "confessions" in Communist-dominated courts. Going back to the first persecution of an internationally famous church leader in the Communist "courts"—that of Patriarch Tikhon, of the Russian Orthodox Church, in 1922 and 1923—we find some parallels with the Mindszenty case.

Because Tikhon had resisted Soviet attacks on the Orthodox Church in particular and on religion in general, he and a number of his clergy were brought to trial on charges of refusing to turn over church property for famine relief. Two archbishops and a number of priests were condemned to death, but Tikhon's trial was postponed. He was brought before a Communist-dominated "conclave," however, at which he was "unfrocked" and "expelled" from the church—but he denied the "conclave's" authenticity and continued to function as Orthodox primate of Russia. Later Tikhon was temporarily released and was quoted officially as making a proposal for Orthodox compromise with the Soviet government—a proposal completely in conflict with his earlier public pronouncements and policies. Then Tikhon's name disappeared from Russian dispatches until announcement of his death (presumably in imprisonment) in 1925. The circumstances surrounding his death never have been cleared up.

A more recent instance of Communist jurisprudence can be found in the purge trials of the old Bolsheviks a dozen years ago.

Among the prominent Communist leaders on trial were men with long and eminent records in overthrowing the old Czarist regime and then in establishing the Soviet system. There also was Marshal Tukhachevsky, once second in command of the Red army.

Most of these old Bolsheviks had been followers of Trotzky, who had been exiled and was later to be assassinated in Mexico. Trotzky was still attacking Stalin for compromising on the simon-pure gospel as handed down by Karl Marx and Lenin, and the outside world suspected strongly that Stalin was simply purging domestic opponents to solidify his position.

The charge was conspiracy with a foreign nation, which meant Nazi Germany. Yet in 1939 Stalin was to sign a treaty of alliance with that same Nazi Germany.

The accused admitted on the witness stand the complete truth of the charges against them—upbraided themselves as arrant traitors to Russia and to the working class of the world—insisted they were confessing voluntarily. Still the world wondered.

For one thing, their whole careers and their innermost convictions made it out of character for the accused to line up on the side of Hitlerism (several were of Jewish extraction). For another thing, the Soviet government was quite capable of inflicting excruciating torture and reprisals on families of the accused men.

[From the Buffalo (N. Y.) Evening News of February 8, 1949]

THE INQUISITION AT BUDAPEST

The Communist People's Court at Budapest has pronounced the sentence of life imprisonment on Cardinal Mindszenty of Hungary; in doing so it was simply echoing the decree of the high command at Moscow. From first to last, the issue was decided there. No one can doubt that it was at the instance of the Kremlin that the cardinal was arrested, tried, and convicted; that by the Kremlin his fate was determined. But one may believe that world opinion, voicing a sense of outrage at the proceedings, was at least effective to prevent the imposition of the death sentence.

The atmosphere of the trial is indicated in this acclamation by a leader of the Communist Party in Hungary:

"A new god has come to you, my people. * * * The new god is born from earth and blood. He strides ahead, and under the thunder of his steps the globe trembles from east to west. This is the Red god. The Seine shudders at his impact and tries to break its banks. Westminster trembles before him like Jericho, and across the green ocean his red shadow falls on the walls of the White House."

Therein was the inspiration for proceedings against Cardinal Mindszenty, the inspiration for everything that has followed. There was no semblance of a trial in such terms as democratic people know and respect. Under their system a man is regarded as innocent until he is proved guilty. Under the Moscow dispensation an accusation carries with it guilt. So it was with Cardinal Mindszenty; he was foredoomed. The so-called trial was farcical; it was pure sham.

As we understand it, Cardinal Mindszenty had opposed nationalization of the Catholic church in Hungary, where 60 percent of the people are Catholic; he had opposed communization of the schools, had maintained international relations—for instance, he had solicited and obtained American dollars in carrying on his work.

If he went further than this—if he did, indeed, challenge the Communist regime politically—this can be said in his defense that the Communists showed a strength of only 17 percent in the popular elections and had gained control of the government by a series of coups. But the Kremlin regarded the continuance of his international relations as his greatest offense. Such relations, beyond the Red influence, are held to be treason in the Kremlin code.

Moscow has manifested hatred of Christianity upon many occasions; it has committed itself to a relentless campaign against the Christian faith. The proceedings at Budapest were just another manifestation of this madness, proceedings which have shocked the whole Christian world. Cardinal Mindszenty in prison for conscience' sake will be an even greater force for Christianity and against communism than he has been in the exercise of his churchly office.

ANOTHER MILESTONE FOR SAM HARDY

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, today the ever good and faithful servant of the Committee on Ways and Means, Sam Hardy, completes the first year of his fifth decade of service—41 years altogether. There is today in the House of Representatives only one Member, the gentleman from Illinois, who was a Member of Congress when Sam Hardy embarked upon his career as an employee of the House. When I was elected to Congress in 1911 Sam was already a veteran of 3 years' service.

I can truthfully say that I have known of no employee during the 24 years that I have been privileged to serve with the Committee on Ways and Means upon whom the committee has relied more heavily in its daily manifold duties. From dawn until midnight, if need be, he has been always available to provide the needed references that any member of the committee might require in the consideration of the legislation before our committee. Service in terms of years is perhaps not so graphic as a quantitative record of the work-load of our committee during the period that Sam Hardy has been employed. He has seen 28 major tax bills enacted into law; 4 tariff bills and, counting the bill to be debated in the House today, 6 laws relating to the reciprocal-trade-agreements program.

I wish for Sam many more years of happy, useful service as a loyal Government employee.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I concur in the remarks made by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in paying tribute to Sam Hardy, a very faithful and efficient employee of the Government. He is a man who enjoys the confidence, respect, and esteem of all the members of our Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I concur in the remarks that have been made with reference to Sam Hardy. I doubt if there is any man in the Government who has a better knowledge of all the documents and papers pertaining to the work of the Committee on Ways and Means over the last 30 or 40 years. He is a splendid outstanding public servant. If we were ever to lose him, it certainly would be a tremendous loss.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I join in what has been said in complimenting Sam Hardy. He is not only an efficient worker, but I compliment him for his innate constant courtesy. He is always courteous and ready to serve.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I trust that Sam will have many years ahead of him to serve the committee and serve the Congress and the country as well as to enjoy life.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WHITTINGTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address delivered by Lt. Gen. R. A. Wheeler, Chief of the Engineers, United States Army, at St. Louis, Monday, February 7, 1949, before the thirtieth annual convention of the Mississippi Valley Association.

FEDERATION OF WESTERN EUROPE

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me conditions in Europe are becoming more serious. The recent trial of Cardinal Mindszenty and the pressure on Norway are symbols of a grave situation. I have therefore introduced the Fulbright resolution in the House, which calls for the approval of the new federation of western Europe. I think the action of Congress approving this newly formed federation may give it the strength and the courage necessary to carry on and to resist the spread of communism in the world.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a very interesting article which appeared in the last issue of the Boston Sunday Post.

EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION COMMISSION

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 325) to amend the act of September 7, 1916, referring to the Employees' Compensation Commission, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GATHINGS]?

There was no objection.

[Mr. GATHINGS addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KEEFE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include therein a radio address delivered by Mr. Joseph C. Harsch on January 30, 1949.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an article from Fortune magazine entitled "ECA Cannot Do Everything." Because it is beyond the limit allowed for printing such documents, I ask unanimous consent that it be included in spite of the cost which the Public Printer has estimated to be $248.50.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FULTON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACKSON of California asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the New York Sunday News.

THE MARINE CORPS

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I am including an article from the Saturday Evening Post by Mr. Richard Tregaskis, famous war correspondent, whose dispatches from the combat theaters of the war brought him widespread and well deserved recognition. Certainly no contemporary newsman is better qualified by virtue of experience and keen insight to more adequately appraise the United States Marine Corps than is Mr. Tregaskis.

The article entitled "The Marine Corps Fights for Its Life" throws a bright spotlight upon what must be considered by any objective observer to be a subtle and unceasing attack upon this great fighting organization, an attack which has as its goal the dismemberment and the eventual abolition of the corps as an effective and highly efficient arm of our National military and naval establishments. It is my feeling, Mr. Speaker, that if the facts of this matter are known to the American people there will be such a widespread protest as to render ineffective any move which would threaten the integrity of this famous fighting organization. For that reason I bring to the attention of the Congress this important contribution by Mr. Tregaskis. We in the Congress who have had the high honor of service in the United States Marine Corps serve notice that we will not stand idly by in the way of thinly veiled threats against the corps.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MERROW asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and in each to include an editorial.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement made by Mr. Walter W. Cenerazzo, president of the American Watch Workers Union.

Mr. LATHAM asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article entitled "The Freedom Road," notwithstanding the fact that the Government Printing Office estimates the cost will be $230.75.

Mr. LOVRE asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a portion of the inaugural address of the Governor of the State of South Dakota.

Mr. TAYLOR asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Troy Record.

Mr. GROSS asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper editorial from the Waverly (Iowa) Independent.

Mr. HALE asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution adopted yesterday by the Republican conference.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. STAGGERS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include proceedings of the American Society of Civil Engineers.

COMMUNISM—THE FORCES OF ANTICHRIST

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, in a few minutes we are going to vote on a resolution providing $200,000 for the Committee on Un-American Activities.

I hope there will not be a dissenting vote. That committee has done more to expose the enemies within our gates, who are here plotting the overthrow of this Government and attempting to undermine and destroy everything for which our country stands, than any other agency of this Government.

I am no longer a member of that committee; but I am still giving it my wholehearted and unqualified support. For I am firmly convinced that unless that committee continues the great work in which we have been engaged, these enemies of our Government and our American way of life will continue their brazen efforts to destroy everything for which the Christian people of America stand.

The persecution of a great religious leader in Europe seems to have awakened some men in this House to the dangers that now confront us. Some of them waited, however, until the Communists had murdered 30,000,000 Christians in Europe.

Atheistic communism is largely composed of a racial minority that has swarmed into Europe through the Urals in the last 100 or 200 years, and has now swarmed into this country and constitutes three-fourths of the membership of the Communist Party in America. They seem to be more akin to Pharaoh than they are to Moses.

Sixty percent of the members of the Communist Party in this country are foreign born.

It is the same old gang that composed the fifth column of the crucifixion. They hounded the Saviour during the days of His ministry; persecuted Him to His ignominious death; derided Him during the moments of His dying agony; and then gambled for His garments at the foot of the cross.

They have been for 1,900 years trying to destroy Christianity and everything that is based on Christian principles.

They have overrun and virtually destroyed Europe.

They are now trying to undermine and destroy America.

God save our country from such a fate.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

AMENDING THE HATCH ACT

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 1243) to amend the Hatch Act.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this the same bill that was passed by the House last year but not acted upon in the Senate?

Mr. STANLEY. I believe this is the same bill that was passed in the Seventy-ninth Congress.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. And it was unanimously reported out of the committee?

Mr. STANLEY. It was unanimously reported from the committee.

Mr. McCORMACK. If the gentleman will yield—and the purpose of the bill is to give discretionary power to the Civil Service Commission rather than the mandatory direction now that punishment must be imposed in the most minor of cases.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 9 (b) of the act entitled "An act to prevent pernicious activities," approved August 2, 1939, is amended to read as follows:

"(b) If in the case of any person violating the provisions of this section it is found by the United States Civil Service Commission that such violation warrants removal he shall be immediately removed from the position or office held by him, and thereafter no part of the funds appropriated by any act of Congress for such position or office shall be used to pay the compensation of such person. If the Commission finds that the violation does not warrant removal, a lesser penalty shall be imposed by direction of the Commission: Provided, That in the case of any person who has heretofore been removed from the service under the provisions of this section, the Commission shall upon request reopen and reconsider the record in such case. If it shall find that the acts committed were such as to warrant a penalty of less than removal it shall issue an order revoking the restriction against reemployment in the position from which removed, or in any other position for which he may be qualified."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FUNDS FOR CONDUCTING STUDIES AND INVESTIGATIONS WITH RESPECT TO GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 88, Rept. No. 37) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the expenses of conducting the studies and investigations with respect to Government operations authorized by rule XI (1) (h) incurred by the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $50,000, including employment of such experts, special counsel, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by said committee and signed by the chairman of the committee, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

SEC. 2. The official committee reporters may be used at all hearings held in the District of Columbia, if not otherwise officially engaged.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FUNDS FOR EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATION AUTHORIZED BY HOUSE RESOLUTION 22

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I submit a privileged resolution (H. Res. 82) to provide funds for the expenses of the investigation and study authorized in House Resolution 22 (Rept. No. 38) with amendment, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the expenses of the investigation and study to be conducted by the select committee created by House Resolution 22, not to exceed $125,000, including expenditures for the employment of investigators, attorneys, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

With the following amendment:

Page 1, line 3, strike out "$125,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$100,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I submit a privileged resolution (H. Res. 78), with an amendment, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the further expenses of conducting the studies and investigations authorized by clause (1) (Q) of rule XI incurred by the Committee on Un-American Activities, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $200,000, including expenditures for printing and binding, employment of such experts, special counsel, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by said committee and signed by the chairman of the committee, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

SEC. 2. The official stenographers to committees may be used at all hearings held in the District of Columbia, if not otherwise officially engaged.

That the funds granted may be expended retroactive to January 4, 1949.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the words "printing and binding".

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes had it.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present, and I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope there is not a quorum present. Then we can have a roll call on this resolution. This is a real test.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not announce that a quorum is present unless there is.

Mr. RANKIN. I know that.

The SPEAKER. Obviously there is not a quorum present.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be read again so that the Members of the House will know what they are voting on.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution may again be reported.

There was no objection.

The Clerk reread House Resolution 78.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 353, nays 29, not voting 53, as follows:

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, due to adverse weather conditions my plane arrived too late for me to answer to my name on the appropriation for the Committee on Un-American Activities. Had I been present I would have voted "No."

TRADE AGREEMENTS EXTENSION ACT OF 1949

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1211) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1211, with Mr. WALTER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee rose yesterday, general debate had been completed, and the first section of the bill was read. That section is now open to amendment.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I expect to support this bill on final passage. With economic conditions as they exist in the world today, the huge sums which we are sending abroad under the European recovery program may well be down the drain unless by increasing our imports we make it possible for friendly nations to get on their feet and thus reduce their dollar shortage.

Since World War I, except for a short period in the twenties when American bankers made ill-advised loans abroad, our export trade has largely been financed by the American taxpayer.

Today the $5,000,000,000 excess of our exports over our imports is still being financed by the American taxpayer. This cannot continue indefinitely.

During the war our farmers and our industrial plants greatly increased their productive capacity. If we are going to maintain prosperity here we must export our surpluses. The chief way in which we must receive payment for these surpluses is by purchasing more of what the world produces.

I quote from an editorial which appeared in the New York Times on February 3, 1949:

> Since we already possess most of the world's gold, the only way in which they can repay the loans which we are making is in the form of goods.

I also quote from an editorial which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune, a Republican newspaper, on February 4, 1949. This is quoted in the minority report signed by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HOLMES] and myself:

> The explicit purpose of the Marshall plan is to free Europe from its bondage to the dollar shortage by 1952; but the dollar shortage will never end unless Europe is given reasonable opportunity to acquire dollars by the sound and straightforward way of sending us goods in honest exchange for them.

The administration has surrounded the trade-agreement program with sham and camouflage. They have given a different reason why they wish it renewed every 3 years. They claim that for every concession which we gave, we have received equal concessions. This is just not a fact. Hindrances to trade by foreign nations are greater now than they were before the trade-agreement program was even suggested.

I do not think it is necessary to fool the American people as to the necessity for this program. I believe that they are adult minded and I have confidence in their good sense. In spite of our failure to receive concessions equal to those which we have granted, the bare fact remains that to keep our country economically sound we must increase our imports, and it is for this reason that I expect to support this bill.

There is nothing in the law now in effect passed by the Eightieth Congress which would have hampered continuation of the program if it were administered in a bold and courageous manner. However, I can understand how a weak and vote-conscious executive department might fear the political implications of publicity of the peril points and that under these circumstances negotiations might be hampered. I, therefore, believe that omission of this publicity might be wise.

Though I will support this bill, this does not mean that it could not be improved.

I believe that all trade agreements should include the escape clause, not merely those negotiated in the past few years. Why should some industries have the benefit of the escape clause, while others do not?

I also agree that it should be mandatory for the Tariff Commission to supply the President with the so-called peril points in confidence. Negotiators should not negotiate blindly. State Department officials may be able negotiators, but they should have the tools with which to do the job properly. And if they wish to take the calculated risk of reducing tariffs below the peril point found by a nonpartisan body of experts they should do so with their eyes open.

However, from the attitude of the Democratic majority I gather that they are not going to allow any amendments, no matter how wise, to be added to this bill. And so in spite of the probable failure of passage of the amendments which I desire, I will vote for the bill as written because I feel that the continuation of this program is an important item in carrying out the present foreign policy of the United States which I am supporting.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, reciprocal trade agreements are generally acknowledged as essential. No one can honestly quarrel with pacts that stimulate trade and improve the economy of all nations.

And, of course, we want to aid in the rehabilitation and restoration of Europe and Asia. That makes good sense and is necessary if we are to have peace. Communism breeds where there is distress and poverty.

In the making of these treaties it must not be forgotten that we must also consider the prosperity of the American worker and the American businessman. The great industrial world of America produced the goods and materials that won two world wars; it has brought to the people of the United States a high state of happiness and prosperity never achieved by any other people. It must not be destroyed by our own Government officials. It is the administration of this act which will determine whether or not it is to be good for the American people.

I recall very well in years past a solemn promise being made that no agreement would be entered into which would destroy any American industry. During the war and the months immediately following an unprecedented demand for goods prevented any harm being done. Now it is a different story. Watchmakers, cotton and woolen textile workers, the jewelers, the silversmiths, the workers in the shoe factories, the hard-pressed pottery industry, the leather shops, the glassware and crockery are all deeply concerned. They see forces being curtailed; thousands losing their jobs. They see overtime shifts being discontinued and short-time schedules established, and in some instances factories closed. The newspapers have lately carried the story of the tragic fate of the once-famed American watch industry—only two left, one in Illinois and one in Pennsylvania, that are able to continue with their own resources. And one of them is also engaged in the manufacture of precision tools. A third, the Waltham Co., located in Waltham, Mass., is a Federal supplicant, seeking Federal funds to continue. The fate of 2,500 workers is in the hands of their Government; whether they shall lose their homes and be forced to wander away seeking a place to work. Those close to the situation frankly state that the future of these concerns is threatened by unfair competition from Switzerland. The jeweled watches from Switzerland can be sold here for less than half the cost of an American-made jeweled watch.

I know some of you will say if they cannot compete let them perish or do something else. That, I submit, is rather harsh treatment in these days when there is so much consideration for social welfare.

That the imports are to blame has been admitted to me by a high-ranking official of the administration.

The watch workers brought their case to the President. He expressed sympathy, so it is reported, and said he did not have the power to give relief. It was to Congress they must go and suggested a study committee in the Ways and Means Committee. Now a study committee is all right but what the 2,500 idle workers of Waltham need is action not study—and now is the time to give them a chance for their day in court.

Let me divert for a moment by saying this is not simply a watch-workers' case alone. Twelve large New England factories must get an RFC loan if they are to continue. Two factories—one in New England and one in Texas—are to be dismantled and shipped to Burma. Puerto Rico beckons with a factory and free taxes for 10 years, cheap labor, and a free import into the United States.

The factory workers have first felt the iron hand of adversity. It will not be long before the cotton grower, the wheat and corn farmer, and the potato grower will find they are in a similar plight.

I repeat my alarm is not against reciprocal trade. It can and must be administered on a fair basis.

Now what is offered in the two amendments of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee.

One is that all items to be negotiated shall be studied by the Tariff Commission—a Commission appointed and controlled by the President. If these studies indicate any industry is placed in peril that fact shall be reported to the President. The report is secret; there is no publicity. The information is given to the President for his guidance. What is wrong with that? Where is there any crippling of the act. The answer is that there is nothing wrong about a President getting all sides of a question before he acts.

The other amendment is the so-called escape clause. This clause has been incorporated in recent treaties; it will presumably be incorporated in the new treaties. But it was not included in the early Swiss treaty. To ever do anything for the watch workers this amendment must be adopted. Let me again remind you it is not compulsory; it gives the administration the right to act if it so desires.

You give here the President broad powers. I am not complaining about that because I realize we are in a dangerous world situation; where other countries have embargoes, quotas, and stop trade by refusing to allow money to leave the country, there is need for broad latitude to our own Government. All we ask in this second amendment is we give the President a chance to act if he so desires to aid a crippled industry like the Waltham watch or others who come into real peril.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, the matter we have under consideration today is one of tremendous importance to the economic and military security of this Nation. It is indeed unfortunate that the American people know so little about our trade relations with other countries of the world. Because of the fact that the whole subject of reciprocal trade is couched in more or less technical language, the daily and weekly press have held it to be of scant interest to the average newspaper reader. Yet the administration proposal we have under consideration this afternoon affects directly or indirectly the good health of our American industries and the job security of our American workmen.

Essentially what the President and his leaders in the Congress ask us to do is to rubber stamp one-man authority to negotiate and consummate treaties with other nations respecting the raising or lowering of tariff rates on goods shipped in from abroad. The President, and the President alone, wants the power to determine how much goods shall be imported into this country, the amount of tariff the importers will pay, and the extent to which these cheap imports will compete with American goods and American markets. Abuse of this power, wittingly or unwittingly, could destroy American industry and cause widespread unemployment among our workers. I submit that no one man, even the President of these United States, should possess such unlimited power over our national economy.

Mr. Truman, in submitting his recommendation for extension of the existing Trade Agreement Act, referred to crippling restrictions imposed by the last Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress. That Congress directed the Tariff Commission to study our trade agreements with specific reference to the so-called peril points—that is the point where the influx of foreign manufactured goods under lower tariff rates would unfairly compete with our own production and place our own industries at a great disadvantage. The Commission was directed to advise the President when a dangerous peril point was reached. If, despite the Commission's warning, the President persisted in further lowering of the tariff rate, he would have to explain to the Congress his reason for such action. These restrictions in nowise crippled, nor did they impede the successful conclusion of trade treaties with other nations. They were designed to protect and operate in the best interests of American industry and the American workingman. We Republicans in this House believe that this protection is not only desirable, but is vitally necessary for the preservation of our own national economy.

These elements of safety are what the President, in a bid for more personal power, seeks to have this Congress remove. In presenting the administration's case before the Ways and Means Committee, administration witnesses failed to show that the safeguards provided by the Eightieth Congress adversely affected the successful negotiation of trade agreements and that they have not operated in the best interests of these United States. Many of us in this House regard the President's attitude on this matter as additional evidence that the grab for executive power we have witnessed under 16 years of the New Deal is to continue unabated under Mr. Truman.

Unless the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act is administered to the advantage of this country, we are in for serious economic difficulties. In entering into agreements with other nations, we must constantly bear in mind that the paramount interests of the United States comes first. This does not imply that we should take unfair advantage of friendly nations in our relations with them. On the contrary, we should negotiate and consummate trade pacts that will promote a healthy flow of trade between the democratic nations of the world. It is through our trade policies that we can build up the tottering economies of our sister nations. But in so doing, we must not tear down or do irreparable harm to our national economy. We must remember that, through our economic recovery program and through other means, such as the Export-Import Bank and the World Monetary Fund, we are pouring literally billions of American dollars into European recovery.

We are rebuilding the industrial might of those nations participating in the Marshall plan. At our own expense we are providing the mass-production machinery which will enable them to mass-produce goods for sale in this country in competition with goods produced in America. These foreign industries employ cheap labor. The wage rates and the conditions under which their employees work are far below the wage and labor standards of the American worker. Their production costs are a mere fraction of the production costs of our industries here in the United States.

Under the stimulus of American aid, these foreign industries are recovering at a rapid pace. The only outlet for their mass production will be world markets, the most attractive of which is in these United States. It is only common sense that, if our tariff barriers are inadequate and our tariff rates are too low, these cheap foreign goods will flood this country, undersell our own products, cause curtailment of American production and result in widespread unemployment among our own workers. To hold our markets, we necessarily will have to reduce our costs of production, which means, of course, that wages must be reduced. The ultimate result will be that our boasted American standard of living will disappear. Anyone who believes we can, through the means of this bill, bring the whole world up to our standard of living is indulging in wishful thinking. We in the Congress are charged with the responsibility of protecting ourselves against such raids and such consequences.

We are already beginning to feel the ill effects of this administration's trade policies. The proceed-with-caution signal is already apparent. This should serve as a warning to go slowly and to be diligent in our future negotiations. Here, Mr. Chairman, are the danger signs: Our New England textile industry is in extremely bad shape. Some plants have closed down completely, others have curtailed production, some are moving to offshore areas, unemployment is steadily rising. Our glass industry is likewise in bad shape, so is our clock and watch industry. I am reliably informed that the Hamilton Watch Co. is the only company operating on a successful basis today. At one time we had 22 watch companies. Now we have three, and only one of the three is operating. The Department of Commerce has just reported that the total number of jobless soared 700,000 in the first week of January, to a total of 2,650,000 unemployed. That is the highest figure since March 1946, when war factories were reconverting to peacetime production. The Commerce Department's report on unemployment was ominous. It said, and I quote:

> Although unemployment ordinarily rises between December and January, with the customary seasonal reduction in trade and outdoor work, the change this year was considerably larger than can be explained by this factor alone.

Other official Government reports disclose that claims for unemployment compensation have increased steadily every week since October. In November, $62,200,000 was paid out in jobless compensation and claims were coming in at the rate of 185,000 a week. By December 25, claims were coming in at the rate of 281,300 a week. In the first week of January new claims were at the rate of 338,677 a week.

The administration knows that its trade policies are contributing to this alarming situation. We find, upon examination, that some of the raw materials exported from this country to other countries of the world as part of our various recovery enterprises, are coming back as finished products and are underselling their American counterpart. Italy, for example, is receiving American cotton and sending it back to us in the form of cotton garments which are competing with our own cotton and textile manufacturers. Foreign-made glassware is abundant in the United States.

There is another disturbing phase to the watch and clock industry. That industry is essential in times of national emergency, and we are literally destroying it through our unrealistic trade policies. During the past war skilled technicians from the watch and clock industry produced delicate precision instruments without which our Nation would not have been able to conclude the war so speedily and so successfully. These instruments were used in our aircraft and other weapons of war.

The watch and clock industry made a major contribution to the creation of the atom bomb. In letters introduced into the record of hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, an Army lieutenant general and a Navy rear admiral stated that this industry is vital to the successful conduct of future wars. Industry witnesses testified that they were told by the National Security Resources Board and other agencies of the national defense establishment that they must be equal to the needs of another emergency. The American jeweled-watch industry is the only major source of supply, outside of Switzerland, for ships' chronometers, navigation watches, stop watches, and so forth. Yet, because of our trade policies, these witnesses testified that they are not equal to the needs of another emergency. They pointed out that the 1936 trade agreement with Switzerland reduced the tariffs on watches and that thereafter the American industry's share in the American market fell sharply. Subsequent to the 1936 agreement, four factors, in addition to the reduction in tariffs, operated to reduce further the tariff protection for the industry. They were:

First. In 1934 we reduced the value of the dollar. This is one of the reasons given in the Tariff Commission's Digest of Trade Data on our trade agreement with Switzerland for reducing watch tariffs in 1936. Four months after the agreement the Swiss devalued the franc by approximately 35 percent, but no compensating increase was made thereafter in the reduced tariffs.

Second. Tariff duties on watches are specific—a definite sum per watch. The subequent inflation has operated to reduce further, on an ad valorem or percentage basis, the protection left by the trade agreement and the devaluation of the Swiss franc.

Third. The duty on adjustments, which was intended to afford progressively greater protection the higher the quality of the watch, has been rendered completely ineffective by the marking of imported watches as unadjusted, regardless of the fact.

Fourth. The cost of watch movement manufacture, which is practically all labor, has been doubled in this country since the beginning of the war. The dollar increase has been disproportionate to that in Switzerland, inasmuch as we started from a higher base cost because of the much higher labor rates in this country. Our labor rates are approximately two and one-half times those of the Swiss for comparable jobs.

Over 55,000,000 jeweled watches and movements have been imported into this country since 1941. The highest point was in 1946 when imports exceeded 9,000,000. During the first 11 months of 1948 imports exceeded 7,100,000. All these watches are advertised and sold as jeweled watches and are competitive with our own products. The Waltham Watch Co. has already felt the full impact of this competition. The plant is closed, its employees out of work, and it is a question whether it will ever resume operation.

Mr. Chairman, the instances I mention are danger signals, and if in our future trade relations we ignore these signals our entire national economy will suffer and our national defense will be endangered. If we proceed to build up the resources of other nations at the expense of our own, we will be well on the road to that recession or depression we are all striving so mightily to avoid. I am not crying "wolf" when there is no wolf. I am not an undue alarmist seeking to disrupt or abolish America's trade relations with other lands. I believe in a healthy trade intercourse with other nations on a fair and equitable basis. But I also believe that our high standard of living should be adequately protected against an influx of cheap goods from abroad which would afford devastating competition with our own high-standard industry and our own highly paid workers.

I believe that the protections contained in the extension measure passed by the Eightieth Congress were necessary to safeguard our national interests. If, by refusing to continue any of those protections, the Congress forces the United States into an economic tailspin and retards our ability to defend ourselves and the Nation in another national emergency, then this Democratic Congress and the Democratic President must be prepared to assume full responsibility for the consequences. And I am most certain, Mr. Chairman, that, when the American people realize what this administration is trying to put over on them, they will demand an accounting. I suggest that the Democratic leadership be prepared with a good answer for its actions—that the answer be better than those given here today for the continuation of a foreign trade program which totally disregards American industry and the American workingman.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, in face of the fact that our bipartisan foreign policy now calls for the making of large loans as well as straight grants to key democracies abroad, with the obvious intent of strengthening their economies and battling communism, it seems to me the part of wisdom and enlightened self-interest that we receive some payments on the grants and loans through imports. Such is the only feasible basis upon which we can get back some of the outlay for the European rehabilitation program. The great role this country is playing in its huge creditor position is an increasingly large and more vital economic problem for this country to face on an international basis. If we should isolate ourselves from payments in kind, we would assure very little repayment of the debt we have created in our huge European outlays.

I believe the reciprocal-trade-agreements also will afford a good vehicle through which to restore our export and import business to private channels of trade at the expiration and termination of the European program. I likewise feel they will facilitate the handling of surpluses which seem to be becoming quite obvious in some industrial and agricultural products. However, I believe that the legislation contained in H. R. 1211 could be materially bettered by placing into its content a call on the President to incorporate an escape clause whereby this Nation could renegotiate a specific duty found to be injurious to American industry after a pact was negotiated. This will lead to a more fair and uniform treatment as all new trade agreements have automatically incorporated in them an escape-clause provision.

I also believe that the legislation could be bettered by calling on the President to furnish to the United States Tariff Commission a list of articles imported into the United States to be considered for possible modification of duty in a trade agreement. Upon receipt of such a list, the Tariff Commission should make an investigation and report findings to the President. This would serve as a guide to the President and negotiating agencies, first, to limit the degree of modification of duty; and, second, to serve as a guide to increase a duty or additional import restrictions, if required, to avoid serious injury to domestic industry.

The above-mentioned suggestions for bettering the legislation were made in the form of amendments by the minority and supported by me, but were not accepted by the majority members of the committee. Nevertheless, I believe that reciprocal trade agreements must continue with extension to 1951, in the face of the present international situation. I believe such action is recognition of reality.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, the reciprocal-trade-agreements program is something that very vitally affects many of the people whom I represent. In my district are raised a number of special types of crops, such as walnuts, almonds, cherries, and so forth. These same kinds of products are raised in several foreign countries. In the past it has frequently been proposed to make trade agreements with countries raising one or more of these products. In each instance, those who have their life savings invested in our specialized crops are apprehensive that the agreement which is made might be destructive of the prosperity and stability of the particular industry and crop which might be affected. Consequently, I feel it my duty to state, although it must be in more or less sketchy form, my reasons for voting for the Trade Agreements Act.

I have gone into this matter with a view of trying to determine what is the proper thing to do in order to adequately protect the people and the property in my congressional district, and also to support a policy which will be proper for the welfare of the Nation as a whole. The underlying idea of the tariff principle is that, because of our high standard of living, and especially the high price paid for labor in America, it is utterly impossible for us to compete in some lines of production, with similar products made abroad with cheap labor, both as to things raised on the farms and as to others that are processed in the factory or the cannery. The basic idea of every tariff has been to equalize the cost of production. But the inevitable result has been, at least in the last two tariff revisions by the Congress, that the schedules have been placed higher than was necessary to adequately protect the difference in the cost of production. This comes about by the fact that the so-called log-rolling process finds full sway in such legislative procedure. One group will ask for protection and it will promise another or many other groups protection for receiving support for itself from the various groups. This vicious circle of trading benefits causes the rates to be set way above what is necessary to adequate protection. This result has followed time and again, despite the protests of Presidents and others that the proposed rates are entirely too high to equalize the difference in the cost of production.

For this reason, I have come to the conclusion that the Congress must protect itself against this inevitable result. Behind some of the tariff walls that we have made has grown up monopoly. The end result is that the consumer pays more for the things that he eats and wears, and uses in other ways, than he should.

Therefore, some years ago, after much discussion of the matter, the reciprocal trade agreement principle was enacted by the Congress. By this method, agreements are made with various countries in which tariff schedules are reduced and they may theoretically be increased, although I do not know of any case where they have been increased. Under the tariff law on books by the Trade Agreements Act, the State Department is authorized to negotiate such agreements.

The State Department, acting for the President, has set up certain machinery to arrive at what is considered fair adjustment. We have been told time and again that consideration is given to every phase of the subject and to the effect of any proposed reduction in tariffs on the economy of the particular product involved. A Committee for Reciprocity Information has been established. Opportunity is afforded to interested persons to appear before the committee and give information. It is stated that every consideration bearing on the problem is taken into account. For instance, it should be noted that in crops like almonds, walnuts, and cherries, that the soil is committed to that kind of a crop. That the investment is tremendous because the first 4 to 7 years are unproductive. It is to be noted that, if a man has a failure in either of these crops, he cannot without tremendous expense transfer to another crop, as it would require the pulling out of the trees which would probably cost more than the cost of the land. The effect of various other factors are alleged to be considered in the fixing of the rate. However, I must say that in all my contact with this matter, I have yet to learn conclusively, to my satisfaction, that the important and major factors are ignored by those who are to make the agreement. In other words, the recommendations are such that, in the opinion of those who are recommending the reduced tariff, the reduction will not affect our economy adversely. I have, therefore, come reluctantly to the view that our negotiations, regarding trade agreements, do in fact consider our American economy and the particular economy in each specific case, and try to adjust the rates so as not to affect it adversely, but simply subject it to reasonable and fair competition.

There is one point that I think should be considered seriously by the Congress in this connection. The ones who do the work are largely State Department officials, although in the present act it is stated that the Tariff Commission is to furnish necessary data in order to arrive at a proper and appropriate conclusion. This is purely optional and not mandatory. It has been charged that the State Department is more interested in building up good will than they are in protecting the American producer. I doubt whether this bald and broad statement is the real fact, but there is this peculiar situation that those who are affected sometimes feel that the State Department does, in fact, give more weight to building up good will abroad than it does to giving protection to the American economy involved.

It would seem to me that an independent agency, whose data should be considered, should make the study involving this single question: Will the proposed tariff reduction by means of a proposed trade agreement adversely affect the economy of the particular product concerned? Will the proposed schedule introduce ruinous competition that may destroy an American industry? The one to make that study is the Tariff Commission. On this Commission are men of great ability and they are supported by a technical staff, many of whom are devoting their lives to a study of tariff problems. These people would have only one objective, and that is to find out as accurately as possible how a proposed trade agreement would affect our economy and, especially, if it would have an adverse effect. I believe that this would give more weight to this conclusion and give more weight to the determination of the State Department as to the specific rate which should be placed in any trade agreement.

Another matter that harasses the minds of those who are affected by these trade agreements, as evidenced in correspondence and conversations with myself, is that they do not know what is the exact basis of the conclusion arrived at. They get no statement in the form of a report as to just what elements were taken into consideration when the conclusion was made. To the persons affected, a reciprocal trade agreement may be likened to a judgment of a court. It is a final determination of a rate on imports and it may be that this rate could or would adversely affect the particular segment of our economy involved. They are bound by it and there is nothing that they can do to change it, except get the trade agreement modified or amended, if there is an escape clause in the agreement. They should be entitled, since their economic life is involved, to a statement giving the reasons which motivated the decision as to the specific schedule entered into in a trade agreement.

I realize that California, in particular, is interested in foreign trade. Many of our agricultural products are produced in surplus, and we must find outlets for these products in foreign countries. Our agricultural economy in the past has been based on the assumption that we would have certain foreign outlets. The British Empire, the Scandinavian countries, Germany, France, the Netherlands, and others were excellent customers for our dried fruits, some types of our grapes, pears, and so forth. Therefore, it is to our advantage that we replenish the channels of international trade. The world is closely knit together, and we must find some way, in our expanding economy, to find outlets abroad for our products. Our ever-increasing production is bound to produce surpluses. At the present time we are not harassed particularly in this regard. The European recovery program is funneling off a great deal of our agricultural production, as well as a good deal of our manufactured goods. But we cannot live forever in this fool's paradise of inflation and short supply and high prices. Inevitably, if the European program works, it will redevelop the economy of Europe, and its people will find it necessary to send us some of their goods. We will also be plagued by surpluses, especially in good years, and we will have to have an outlet in foreign countries. As I see it, anything which tends to stimulate the channels of trade, without lowering our standard of living, is a good thing. An increase of the standard of living abroad to the extent that foreigners use and continue to expand the use of our products will help American prosperity. These are some of the things that have impelled me to vote for the reciprocal trade-agreements bill.

I intend to vote for the reciprocal trade bill now before us. However, I also intend to vote for the amendment requiring that in the process the Tariff Commission's data be the data that is used in determining the effect on the American economy of any proposed agreement. Whether the amendment passes or not, which I am convinced would be beneficial to everyone concerned, I intend to vote for the bill. No system which we devise can give complete justice to every single segment of our economy. But by and large, I believe the reciprocal trade program will replenish our foreign trade, will be administered so as to adequately protect producers and manufacturers in our localities in California and will result in the increase in foreign trade which will be desirable and beneficial to our overall economy.

Also, the escape-clause principle should be applied to all reciprocal trade agreements, past as well as future ones.

I also wish to state that, if any proposed trade agreement is suggested affecting any of our goods in California, I will do everything I can to help those who wish to appear to present a good case and also to receive fair trade treatment by the agencies involved in considering whether or not the proposed agreement should be entered into and what the rate should be in order to properly protect our local industry in California.

Another aspect of this matter is that I believe a healthy international trade situation will promote national security. It has been my privilege to study security problems intimately in each session of four Congresses. Nothing is more important than to try to build our security and to develop world peace. I believe that this general program will move in that general direction. It is impossible to accurately determine how much effect this will have on bringing about a stable and peaceful world. That it will have some effect, I am certain. This, likewise, weighs in my mind in favor of continuing the reciprocal trade-agreements program.

These are some of the thoughts that go through my mind which I wish my constituents to know as the impelling ones which move me to vote for this program. It was a difficult problem to decide, but I have convinced myself that I would be unworthy to those who elected me, as well as to my own conscience, not to follow the conclusions that I have arrived at after much thinking and serious deliberation.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to urge the adoption of the so-called peril-point amendment, the so-called escape-clause amendment, and any other amendment which may be offered to protect American labor.

I rise particularly to support the so-called escape-clause amendment which will shortly be offered, and to express the hope that the Democratic majority of this House will see fit to accept it.

This amendment will permit renegotiation by the President whenever an industry may be jeopardized under any trade agreement.

Frankly, I cannot see why or how any Member of this House, regardless of party affiliation, who has at heart the best interests of the great body of patriotic, hard-working men and women in this country who compose our labor force, can oppose this amendment.

I appreciate fully the importance of international trade. Under present world conditions, and the task which we have set for ourselves, confronted as we are by the menace of world-wide communism, international trade is vital.

But surely, Mr. Chairman, we have the right; yes, we have the obligation to safeguard American labor from the loss of its means of livelihood—from being thrown into the army of the unemployed—if the administration misjudges the effects of any particular trade agreement under existing policy.

We talk of a reciprocal-trade-agreement policy. That policy, Mr. Chairman, has never been reciprocal, in my opinion. But whatever it may be termed, every man and woman in this House today knows that once a concession is made to one country, that concession, generally speaking, applies to every other country on the face of the earth which produces the commodity in question.

Who can tell what the adverse effects under any trade agreement may be under these conditions?

The distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], has referred to the painful situation in the watch industry at this time. Please bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that this industry has been certified by the military authorities as essential in terms of precision instruments in times of war.

A few years ago there were over 20 firms in this country commanding about 55 percent of the domestic market. Today there are only three firms commanding about 18 percent of that market. Of the three, one, the Waltham Watch Co., is in the State of Massachusetts. Recently it closed its doors, and today it would be without hope were it not for a helping hand recently extended by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The workers in that concern and their families comprise, I am informed, about 25 percent of the population of the city where it is located. It is a tragic situation; others may follow.

This country has been flooded with watches imported from Switzerland, produced by underpaid labor, at prices with which we cannot compete.

Again and again in recent years this situation has been brought to the attention of the Truman administration through the State Department and Tariff Commission. Nothing effective whatsoever has been done by the administration.

Why? Largely, Mr. Chairman, because there has been no proper escape clause in the applicable agreement with the Government of Switzerland.

A proper escape clause has been included in certain agreements from the outset. Still others have been renegotiated for the purpose of including that clause.

The amendment which will be offered will simply make it mandatory that every trade agreement hereafter shall include a proper escape clause.

I am for international trade, Mr. Chairman, but I am also for the protection of the men and women in this country who labor in our plants and contribute to the industrial success of this Nation.

In the name of American labor, in the name of American industry, essential in time of war, I appeal for the unanimous approval of the escape-clause amendment when offered and for the approval of any other amendments which will safeguard the jobs of the rank and file of labor.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Chairman, while I am not a member of the committee reporting this bill, this particular subject is one in which I have been very much interested for many years.

It seems to me there are two important points which have been brought up during yesterday's debate and again today, but which have not yet been sufficiently clarified. The first point is that section 5 of the proposed bill, as reported by the committee and on which we are now to vote, expressly provides, with reference to the powers and duties of the President, as follows:

> And before concluding such agreement, the President shall seek information and advice with respect thereto from the United States Tariff Commission, from the Departments of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, from the National Military Establishment, and from such other sources as he may deem appropriate.

I read that especially in view of the comments of our distinguished minority leader, whose remarks seem to imply at least that, even though the President did appoint the Tariff Commission, he need not consult the Tariff Commission if he did not so desire. But the language I have just read makes it mandatory upon the President so to do.

I call the attention of the committee to the fact that it is compulsory in the bill before us today as written that the President shall seek information and advice from the Tariff Commission which he himself appoints. There is no need for the amendment proposed by the Republican minority that the Tariff Commission shall give the President information and advice. The committee bill as drawn already so provides.

And because I realize that many Members of the House have probably not had the time to read the full text of the voluminous hearings before the committee, and I having done that, I call attention to the fact that on page 751 of the printed hearings before the committee there is a letter dated in January of this year from the committee on commercial policy, United States Associates, International Chamber of Commerce, New York, which states:

> The United States Associates strongly urge the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act for a period of not less than 5 years.
> The world now needs more than ever the assurance of a continuing and resolute foreign economic policy and strong leadership by the United States. If the act were to be extended for a period of not less than 5 years, this assurance of itself would be an act of leadership.
> In April 1949 at Geneva the United States will participate in trade negotiations with 13 countries which have not yet subscribed to the 1947 general agreement on tariffs and trade. We should not be prevented there from securing and giving real concessions out of which can come a substantial incentive for further revival of international trade.
> Instead, our team of negotiators at Geneva should be supported by a reciprocal-trade-agreements act permitting them to exert dynamic leadership. For that reason the crippling Gearhart amendment to the 1948 renewal of the act should be eliminated and the act should be extended early in 1949 before the Geneva negotiations begin.

JOSEPH M. HARTFIELD,
Chairman, Committee on Commercial Policy.

I call the following sentence to the particular attention of the gentleman on the Republican side of this House:

For that reason the crippling Gearhart amendment to the 1948 renewal of the act should be eliminated and the act should be extended early in 1949 before the Geneva negotiations begin.

Now, I call attention to page 756 of the same hearings before the committee, on which there appears a letter dated January 24, 1949, to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House. It is from the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. I read this letter in part only to save time, but I think that the Members of Congress generally understand and believe that the Chamber of Commerce of the United States speaks loudly and primarily for the business, industrial, the manufacturing, and the commercial interests of our Nation. This is primarily what the chamber of commerce is organized for in each community and in the Nation, and they are not to be criticized for it. But, with this understanding, gentlemen, of their purpose, I read only one of the important portions of the rather lengthy letter printed in the hearings, as follows:

The policy of the Trade Agreements Act should be continued. * * * This policy, which was reaffirmed in 1946 through referendum of the chamber's membership, by a vote of 2,443 to 17, represents the present position of the chamber on the trade-agreements program.

In the spring of last year, preceding passage of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948, the chamber presented testimony at House and Senate hearings in opposition to proposed amendments being considered at that time. * * * We recommended that the legislation and the procedures as they then stood should be continued without alteration for a period of at least 3 years. * * *

The provisions of H. R. 1211, now before your committee, calling for the repeal of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948, and extension of the act as it existed before passage of that legislation for a period of 3 years from June 12, 1948, are in accord with chamber policy. We urge that the committee and the Congress approve the measure.

Sincerely yours,
EARL O. SHREVE, President.

It being a recognized fact, then, that the Chamber of Commerce of the United States speaks for the chambers of commerce all over the United States—and there are hundreds and hundreds of them—we have a right to assume, do we not, from this letter dated January 24, 1949, that the business, the commercial, the industrial, the manufacturing interests of our Nation want H. R. 1211 passed as submitted by the committee and without either of these amendments which the Republican minority have now submitted. Certainly, gentlemen, the United States Chamber of Commerce, under such recent date as January 24, 1949, and having had express knowledge of the pending consideration of reciprocal-trade agreements before our distinguished committee in this House, would never have written this official letter, received by the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee less than a month ago, if the business, industrial, shipping, fishing, commercial, manufacturing interests of the Nation had communicated through their respective chambers of commerce in their own localities opposition to the proposal of this Democratic administration to carry out the wishes and purposes of our distinguished President of the United States, Harry S. Truman, who communicated to our distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman from North Carolina, Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, under date of January 8, 1949, his message asking that the crippling provisions of the Trade Agreements Act inserted by the Eightieth Congress be removed from the act. I call your attention to the letter of the President of the United States as it appeared on page 2 of the printed hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means, as follows:

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In my message on the state of the Union I asked the Congress to act promptly to extend the Trade Agreements Act without the hampering restrictions placed on it by the last Congress.

As you know, negotiations will begin in April to extend the benefits of the general agreement on tariffs and trade to 13 countries that did not participate in the original agreement. This general agreement, concluded in the autumn of 1947, is the most important and comprehensive trade agreement in history. Under it, the United States and 22 other nations agreed to reduce their tariffs, or to maintain low tariffs or none at all, on a wide variety of products. The products affected accounted in 1938 for over half of the world's international trade. In addition, the participating countries agreed to curb the use of other trade restrictions, such as import quotas, and to limit various kinds of discrimination, such as preferential treatment of imports from one country as against those from another. Never before have so many nations combined in such an intensive effort to reduce barriers to trade.

The extension of the benefits of this agreement under the authority of the Trade Agreements Act is a practical cooperative effort to remove unnecessary obstacles to the building of a stable and prosperous world. The restrictive provisions and limited extension of the present trade-agreements law materially hamper the effectiveness of United States participation in this effort. That is why it is so imporant that the existing Trade Agreements Act be promptly repealed, and that the act as it existed on March 1, 1948, be extended for a further substantial period. I suggest that this period be until June 12, 1951.

Unless nations can sell each other the products of their agriculture, labor, and industry to the greatest possible extent, there can be no sure foundation for economic peace. Unless world trade is increased, the tremendous investment we are making toward world economic recovery will be largely wasted. Unless trade restrictions are relaxed, the lot of the private trader in international trade will become increasingly difficult.

In the achievement of these objectives, United States leadership and United States action is a decisive influence.

The trade-agreements program has proved itself to the people of the United States. It has justly earned their overwhelming support. We must be in a position to press that program forward with vigor.

I know that I can count on your continued support in securing necessary action to this end at the earliest possible date.

Sincerely yours,
HARRY S. TRUMAN.

Therefore, gentlemen, this bill should pass without either of these crippling amendments being adopted for three reasons, amongst others:

First. The President of the United States, who is charged by law, custom, and position with such matters, has clearly called our attention to the fact that the reciprocal-trade agreements are an established part of our national and international policy in such matters, and he further clearly reminds us that the condition of the world demands its extension as provided in this bill and that the essence of this bill has already proved beneficial to our Nation and to world trade.

Second. The official speaking unit or committee for the business, industrial, shipping, fishing, mercantile establishments of our Nation, as represented by the United States Chamber of Commerce, by its official letter to Congress, disproves the claims of the Republican minority, who are fighting this bill and who threaten to try to put back into it the two crippling features which were written into it during the Eightieth Congress.

Third. The expressed desire and hope and wish of the American people in the November 2 election was clearly to the effect that the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, as campaigned for by the President of the United States in his talks with the American people and his campaign by the Democratic records in the House and Senate of the United States, was to the effect that the American people again wanted the good will and the trade, on a reciprocal basis, to be extended between the nations of the world.

This can only be most promptly and adequately accomplished by the passage of the bill before the House without either of the emasculating amendments proposed by the minority being adopted.

I submit that the expressed opinion of the industrial, the commercial, and the manufacturing interests of the United States is not represented by the present opposition in the House to this bill.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOYLE. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman referred to the action of the New York Chamber of Commerce. Of course, I do not know everybody in the New York Chamber of Commerce, but I know one most distinguished member of that chamber of commerce. He has issued a pamphlet directly opposed to what the chamber says in the resolution which the gentleman has just read.

Mr. DOYLE. Of course he did it as an individual, but here we have the official action of the United States Chamber of Commerce itself as shown in its letter printed in the hearings.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the Republican Party's No. 1 ghost has walked again. He has even talked again.

Last night, with the same self-assured, cocky air that has characterized him through two Presidential campaigns, Thomas E. Dewey came around to tell the few Republicans who are interested in his views what is wrong with the Republican Party. He revealed both his lack of political know-how and his innate bad taste. Why he ever accepted the invitation to speak again, this soon after his second debacle, only Dewey and his group of so-called advisers could tell.

News reporters were around, as usual, asking him if he would run again. If there are any reporters or members of the Republican Party who think that Dewey has one chance in ten billion in ever again being the Presidential standard bearer of the Republican Party, let me right now disillusion them. Thomas E. Dewey is through. Washed up. Finished.

And, now that he is through—finished—washed up—there is little need for him to go around the country pointing the finger of scorn at anyone else. There are only two men in the United States responsible for Thomas E. Dewey's defeat.

The No. 1 is Thomas E. Dewey. The other is Herbert Brownell, who was Dewey's campaign manager during the 1944 debacle and during the 1948 rout. In each instance, Brownell and Dewey forgot the first principles of political campaigning in this country. They went out of their way to alienate the politicians who had won elections for years and they searched frantically high and low for so-called public relations and advertising specialists. These advertising specialists were good at selling soap, Arrid, Tums, toothpaste, and other commodities you may eat, wear, or with which you may perfume yourself, but they had not the faintest conception of how to sell the people a man or an idea. They failed miserably in two campaigns, under the tutelage of Dewey and Brownell, but I did not see any notice of his mentioning them last night.

Mr. Chairman, I did not have a chance to get down to hear Dewey in person last night. I had another engagement, and, to tell the truth, I was not interested. I mean nothing personal against him, of course.

But I did glance over the newspapers this morning, and if he was correctly quoted he is so punch-drunk after two successive defeats that he does not know what hit him. In fact, he is so groggy that he seems to be taking cracks at his old self.

He told the Republican Party for instance, according to the newspapers, "to tell the people where it stands and why." O Lord, Mr. Chairman, Dewey is just about 4 months too late in learning this bitter lesson. He is the only man in American history to campaign for office of President and not take a single decisive stand on any issue whatsoever. Several of my friends remarked on that fact to me before the election. One of them stated flatly: "I suppose Dewey will win. But if so he will be the only man in American history ever to be elected President without taking a stand on a single, solitary issue."

Then Mr. Dewey started talking about liberals, progressives, and reactionaries. He did not define these terms. Oh, no; that would have been fatal, for then he would not have been able to talk any longer. There has been more bull spouted about liberalism, conservatism, progressivism, and reaction during the New Deal than in any other era in world history. Dewey still thinks it is an issue. By now he should have learned that these are symbols, carefully planted in the minds of the people by those who would confuse and divide America. The Republicans must quit falling for these symbols of the opposition. They must develop their own smear words and symbols. If we are going to have political wars let us have them fought out by two equals, not between a propaganda giant such as the New Deal represents and a propaganda pigmy such as Dewey and the Republican Party represented in the recent elections.

If the pepole are ruled by symbols—meaningless symbols in most instances—why should Dewey use the symbols cultivated and implanted by the New Deal to describe his own defeat? Because, as I often have maintained, Dewey is a New Dealer but he just does not know it. I am telling him. Instead of reading anyone else out of the Republican Party, which this self-styled elder statesman has no right to do, the officials of our party ought to invite him either to follow their leadership or move over to the opposition. Let no Republicans get angry and leave the party because of what Dewey has said. He has chalked up new losing records for this century and it is time for us to forget him once and for all.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment.

I had intended to offer an amendment to put fisheries in this bill so that the people whom I represent would have a fair chance with the people from Canada, Newfoundland, and the other countries that are in these so-called trade agreements. However, I am not going to offer that amendment because I am afraid if you turn that down you might turn down the other. I want you to have in mind when you vote on it what you are doing, because, under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], the former Speaker of this House, the people of this country, whom I represent and whom you represent, will be put on a square and fair deal with other countries so far as tariffs are concerned.

I was in the First World War and I was in England and France. You could not buy any American tobacco then. You cannot buy any American tobacco there today. If you go to your neighboring country, Canada, you pay 35 or 40 cents for a package of cigarettes. The only thing you can buy there is a package of cigarettes—I have forgotten the name of them now—but it was something that they put pictures in when I was a little boy. So there is only one thing that we have to consider as I see it, and that is whether or not we are going to protect the American workingman or the man who invests his money in tobacco, in cotton, or whatever it is. That is the only thing I think we are supposed to do here—to look out for our own. When we do that we will have peace with the world. It is all right from the top to talk about reciprocal trade. The only reciprocity there is is the United States of America. We get no reciprocity from any foreign country and we have not gotten it. If you want to ship something to some foreign country you just see what the tariff is on it, whether it is cotton, tobacco, watches, or any other thing that we produce in this country. If people are going to walk the streets, I want them to walk the streets somewhere else than in my district, and I think you do also.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. NICHOLSON] has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate having an opportunity to make a general statement at this time regarding the legislation now before the House. I will speak more specifically regarding amendments that are to be offered later on.

I wish to tell the House at this time that my particular interest in this legislation springs from my interest in national defense. But as I see the legislation outlined in this bill, it places the volume of trade first and national defense very much in second place.

An amendment to be offered will protect us in letting the President know where the peril points are. Without an amendment to this legislation you have no assurance that the President has any place to go for that information when it is most needed.

I have given more time to strategic and critical materials than any other phase of national defense, but I have also given considerable time to the matter of pools of skilled workers, and that is the reason for my interest in the health and welfare of the watchmaking industry.

To those of you who have mining interests, I suggest you read the prepared statements by Mr. Long and his associates on pages 420 and 422 of the hearings. If you have mining interests, if you are interested, as I am, in the health and vigor of the mining industry domestically, as a safeguard in our national defense, read those statements and ponder long and well before you support the legislation now before you without some investigation and without some analysis of the effect of the proposed amendments to this legislation and what they will do for you and your mining industry.

There is testimony in the hearings regarding the importance of a stock pile of strategic and critical materials. Let me tell you a healthy and vigorous mining industry is of far greater importance than the stock pile itself.

Let me call Forrestal's attention to the fact that, in his answer to the position I took in the committee during the hearings, at no time did he discuss the point in this legislation that is vital to national defense. I did not ever maintain that the reciprocal-trade program was a threat; no, I maintained that a reciprocal-trade program where you march forward in the dark without a knowledge of the peril points is a step dangerous to national defense.

I look to the Tariff Commission to keep the President informed of when we are up to any kind of a peril point. That is not an argument for or against reciprocal treaties; that is an argument, I hope, to build a bigger and better reciprocal-trade program, one that is safe; and for me I will always put national defense ahead of mere volume of trade. To me this proposed legislation puts volume of trade ahead of national defense. National defense is told to go sit down in a corner. Forrestal did not discuss the need for the peril point determination in his letter. I wish he had given me a concrete and definite statement on that point, but he did not do it.

I am holding Forrestal, however, responsible for the caliber and the adequacy of our national defense; that is his responsibility. It is no cure to turn back to the days of 1940 and preserve that particular number of skilled watchmakers, because I sweat blood in the Committee on Military Affairs wondering whether we were going to get an adequate number of skilled workmen. It is time Forrestal was giving some attention to building up a better stock pile of skilled workers than we had in 1940, because we may not be given 2 years to get ready for any future war. That is his responsibility.

The reciprocal-trade program can by proper amendment be made safe for adequate national defense. Without those amendments you move forward at your peril. I will have more to say on that when the amendments are offered.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time simply to elaborate on what the distinguished gentleman from Iowa has said. There was something that happened in connection with the last World War that illustrated to me how important certain materials are. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] admonished us to be careful with reference to the mining industry. I am sure every Member of the House will remember that in the last World War there were five German spies arrested off the coast of Florida. It was discovered that those five had come to do damage to a very strategic industry that even I, brought up in the section where that industry flourishes, did not know was so important. Anyone who knows anything about the making of steel and iron knows that the white-hot molten product flows through a small opening in the bottom of the furnace. Everyone knows who knows anything about the steel industry that the hole in those furnaces is sealed or stopped up with a certain kind of clay. That clay is produced in a limited number of places in the United States. These spies were going to those places where that kind of clay was produced to destroy the clay plants there; and if they had been successful they could have stopped practically every furnace in the United States in a short time. Very few people in the whole country did or could know about how strategic this material was.

We cannot expect the President to know all about what commodity is important and what is vital; we cannot expect him to know the peril there will be to all industries in the admission of commodities. But we have a commission down there that does know and ought to know; I refer to the Tariff Commission, and that Commission ought to have a chance to have a say in such important matters. We propose to try to see that it does.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to note that the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Tobin, urges revision of trade pacts to help United States watchmakers in an Associated Press article of this date. I read as follows:

WASHINGTON.—Secretary of Labor Tobin said he thought that too many Swiss watches have been imported, and urged swift revision of reciprocal-trade agreements to help domestic watchmakers.

Mr. Tobin, former mayor of Boston and Governor of Massachusetts, recently intervened in an effort to save the Waltham Watch Co. plant at Waltham, Mass., from closing down.

He praised the effect of the reciprocal-trade agreements generally, but said that the large inflow of watches was an example of how it could affect a domestic industry adversely.

Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of Labor is to be congratulated upon his forthrightness, his honesty, and his loyalty to the workers of the United States and for his interest in the defense of this Republic.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Will the amendment which the gentleman proposes to offer later in the afternoon to provide for an escape clause in all trade agreements give some protection?

Mr. CURTIS. It will give some protection and it can give a great deal of protection. I want to be very frank about this. There are two things that are required, an escape clause and a forthright, honest administration. The escape clause is important because the act being passed today will be effective in trade agreements for years and years to come and it should be written into law. It will make possible a certain amount of relief.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. What form will that escape clause take and what will the procedure be that we have to follow in order to get the benefit of the escape clause in the bill?

Mr. CURTIS. The escape clause procedure is quite cumbersome. The affected groups, of course, will have to appear before the Tariff Commission and present their case. The Tariff Commission makes their finding and reports to the President. The President may or may not take action under the escape clause. The President may issue a directive at once taking advantage of the escape clause. But if he cannot get the foreign country to agree, that foreign country may withdraw equivalent concessions. It is a bit cumbersome and without the proper kind of administration it will not do what it ought to do, but we are legislating perhaps for many, many years to come and that is why it is important.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Chairman, everything related to the American concept of liberty and justice stands condemned to contempt and ridicule by minions of the Kremlin who have committed the basest of all crimes—the assassination of decency itself.

Men everywhere are horrified at the perfidy of Moscow, the epitome of deceit and treachery. While hirelings of the Kremlin mouth fancy phrases having to do with peace and democracy, the Moscow-dominated government of Hungary condemns to a living death the champion of truth and justice in that country.

In the conviction of Cardinal Mindszenty the rulers in the Kremlin have pronounced themselves irrevocably opposed to the American concept of liberty and justice. Not content with merely insulting the Catholics of the world, with malice aforethought, they conjured up a deliberate insult to the United States of America. With their bleatings of Yankee imperialism they have made their purpose clear. It is not only the Vatican Russia despises, it is these United States which they are also bent on destroying. And this great Nation of ours has fallen upon sad times if it permits this insult to justice and decency to go unanswered.

Committees of this Congress have before them resolutions denouncing the conduct of the Government of Hungary. I implore the chairman of our Foreign Affairs Committee to bring the House resolution to the floor. Let us set the record straight. We stand for honor and truth and justice. We revolt at this crime against humanity, which has been dictated by the Moscow overlords of Hungary. This is not merely a matter of the internal affairs of Hungary. This is conduct which shocks the hearts of all men. I insist that our Government must take formal action. This matter must be presented formally to the United Nations. The Government of Hungary and the men in the Kremlin must understand there is a limit to what we will stand for.

Unless this Congress acts now, I shall, though I am but one Member of this House, appeal to the Secretary General of the United Nations personally to bring this matter up at the very first opportunity.

In the meantime, the United States Minister to Hungary should be recalled immediately.

The Foreign Affairs Committee of the Congress needs his advice and counsel.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, the arguments presented here in the last 10 or 15 minutes are an indication of how the minority is trying to becloud the issue before us today. They are pointing out the case of the Waltham Watch Co., which is a company that, since the turn of the century, has gone into bankruptcy at least three times because of the inefficiency of its management, because it has not kept in step with the progress of other companies in America manufacturing watches and because of some financial manipulations in which the controlling personnel of that corporation has engaged. The simple fact of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, that the other two big watch companies in this country have been exceedingly prosperous. The American watch industry is in a very healthy condition. The American watch industry right now produces and is capable only of producing at its maximum effort 3,000,000 jeweled watches. Now the demand of the American people for watches is 9,000,000 jeweled watches a year. So the American watch industry is incapable of producing enough watches to supply the American demand.

They talk about national defense. Yesterday the chairman of our committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], read into the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of Defense which stated in effect that the American watch industry took its full share of the responsibility during the war period, and that he is not aware that the capabilities of the watch industry have been adversely affected by the reciprocal-trade authority.

Mr. Chairman, there is nothing at all to this matter. These gentlemen on the minority side ask us to pass special legislation to take care of an industry that after the First World War went into bankruptcy, and before the First World War went into bankruptcy, and after the Second World War is asking the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for a loan of $6,000,000, when the Elgin Watch Co. and the Hamilton Watch Co. in this country are each making handsome profits.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is really his argument to finally kill this industry so vital to national defense?

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman is surely talking about a single company—not the watch industry. Sufficient testimony has been presented to show the inefficient management of the Waltham Co. that it has shown in wartime and peacetime, and it is not keeping up with the times. It is only a matter, Mr. Chairman, of trying to becloud the issue. If the membership will turn to page 986 of yesterday's RECORD, you will see where the Secretary of National Defense says that the domestic jeweled-watch industry has fulfilled its role in our program of national defense, and that he is not aware that its capabilities have been adversely affected by the reciprocal-trade-agreement program.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. The gentleman's argument in regard to the watch industry and what its troubles amount to is not supported by the testimony taken before our committee, with the exception of the testimony of the Swiss importers who have a financial interest in this legislation.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, that is just the opinion of the gentleman from Nebraska. Just the reverse is borne out by the record.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman is correct. And, I want to say this also for the information of the gentleman from Nebraska and the other Members, if they will turn to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COMBS] yesterday on this very subject, he referred to a book that was written by a man who was paid by the Waltham Watch Co., in which the history of the Waltham Watch Co. is detailed. This book indicates that the company had been inefficiently managed, and that its finances have been juggled around so that the company could never prosper under its present management and under its present financial situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, we have been exceedingly liberal here. We have allowed an hour of general debate. Not a single amendment has yet been offered. I think we ought to make some progress with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the first section of this bill and all amendments thereto close in not to exceed 20 minutes.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts and Mr. NICHOLSON objected.

Mr. COOPER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on section 1 of this bill and all amendments thereto close in not to exceed 20 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN].

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I have no financial interest in the Waltham Watch Co. and know nothing about the company, but I deprecate the attack upon the laboring men of that company who produce the Waltham watches. I have in my hand a Waltham watch that I have used for over 30 years. It has kept better time than the clocks in the House. Therefore I hope that those who are now making an attack upon the integrity and skill of the American laborers in the Waltham watch factory will feel more kindly toward them when they consider the future welfare of these American workers.

As a Member of this House I have always felt that it is up to Congress to legislate for the welfare of the people when it comes to the question of tariffs. I thought that we as an elected body could do that in better manner than to leave it to some agency which is not responsible to the people. We have been elected and should do our constitutional duty instead of delegating it to the President.

I recognize that the magnitude of the business done by the United States Government and the multiplicity of policies we have in operation over the world makes things confusing not only to Members of the House but also for the people. I thought I would mention just one or two items that confuse the issue and are involved in reciprocal trade.

You remember that we are supporting the price of potatoes in this country. The United States Government will spend more than $200,000,000 to support the price of potatoes from the 1948 crop. We will buy over 32,000,000 bushels of potatoes in Maine. We will buy about 38,000,000 bushels in New York State at a cost of around $30,000,000. During the time that we are buying these surplus potatoes, because of the fact that the duty on potatoes from Canada was reduced from 75 cents to 37½ cents for 3,000,000 bushels in the reciprocal-trade agreements, more than 5,000,000 bushels of the Canadian crop have come into the United States and have been sold in the cities along the eastern coast at a price below the support price. Therefore, in fact, we in this country are compelled to spend more money for potatoes produced in the United States in order to provide a market for Canadian potatoes under the reciprocal-trade law, and it is going to cost the American taxpayers over $200,000,000 this year.

Another thing, although it may not directly relate to the reciprocal-trade program, is this. You will recollect that we had one of the biggest wheat crops in the history of our country in 1948. We consume about 800,000,000 or 900,000,000 bushels in this country, and we have to sell or give away the rest in the world market, and we want to get rid of our surplus to avoid crashes in the commodity market such as are taking place today.

To keep the record straight on wheat, I saw a few days ago that the Economic Cooperation Administration, or the Marshall plan, had turned over $55,000,000 to England to buy wheat in Canada. I thought it was rather strange that the American taxpayer should be taxed to give money to England so that they could buy wheat in Canada, when we have a large surplus in the United States. Before coming to the floor, I thought I would check on it, and, lo and behold, a report came from the ECA that it is not $55,000,000; that for the 12 months beginning April 3, 1948, we are turning over to England $300,000,000, to buy nearly 160,000,000 bushels of wheat in Canada, when we have a surplus here.

The wheat price has been going down the full 10 cents a day for the last 2 or 3 days, and nobody knows when it is going to hit the bottom.

Now these are matters that confuse me. Here the American people are paying taxes to give the money away to some other country so that they can buy something from still another country while we are sitting here with a surplus of the same commodity that this other country, to wit, England, is purchasing today. That seems a little funny, does it not? And does not that potato deal seem funny?

We buy $200,000,000 worth of potatoes to destroy them and at the same time we provide a market for the Canadian farmers who can come to this country and sell potatoes at a lower price than the Government here is supporting them.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. In fact the gentleman from Minnesota, now speaking in the well of the House [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN], is one of the most distinguished agriculturists in the United States, and it just illustrates the point that even he cannot get an answer on this question from the Tariff Commission.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I thank the gentleman for his kind observation.

I favor support prices to encourage production of food in the United States, but the folly of the Truman administration's policy, as I have outlined, will require larger appropriations to support the price of wheat and potatoes produced in this country. We are, in fact, supporting the price of Canadian wheat and potatoes and providing a market for these products in the United States or some other country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington [Mr. TOLLEFSON].

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Chairman, I support the principles of H. R. 1211, the reciprocal-trade bill, which is before the House today. However, I do want to bring to the attention of the Members the situation which involves the employment of several thousands of workers in the Pacific Northwest area who are employed in the plywood, the fishery, and the fruit industries. It is my firm belief that we should write this legislation in such a way as not to destroy these industries which play such a vital part in our economy. It is true that from the broader viewpoint we must encourage world trade, and act upon trade barriers in such a way as to make possible the freer flow of goods between nations. In light of world conditions we are all aware of the tremendous task which is ours to stimulate world recovery from the effects of the late war. But let us not enter upon that task blindly. Let us recognize that to do an effective job we must ourselves be economically strong, otherwise we will fail in what we are trying to do. If we recklessly pass legislation without due regard to all the factors, we may in the process destroy certain segments of our economy. If enough segments are destroyed the whole economy may be so weakened as to make it impossible for us to attain our ultimate objective.

Should not those who are charged with the authority to negotiate trade agreements be given to understand that Congress does not intend that segments of our industry shall be destroyed? Should not they be asked to give due and serious consideration to the interests and problems of each industry affected by the particular agreement entered into with other nations? Is it asking too much for Americans to say to them, "Don't sell us down the river when you are negotiating trade treaties"? I do not believe so. Thousands of workers in the industries I have referred to are concerned because they know that when their products can no longer compete with foreign imports their jobs will be gone. Mr. Chairman, I urge the most serious consideration of this legislation now before us.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I am taking this time to talk to my Democratic friends and to tell them what I had intended to tell my Republican friends in our Republican conference yesterday morning when I did not have the time. The over-all question before the Eighty-first Congress, as I see it, is this: "Shall the Eighty-first Congress go down in history as the repudiating Congress?" We have already repudiated the good work that was done by the Rules Committee of the Eightieth Congress when we emasculated that committee because it had prevented from coming to the floor of the House $21,000,000,000 worth of authorizations which we did not want to face. When we repudiated the work of the Rules Committee of the Eightieth Congress we tactily admitted to the people of the Nation that President Truman was right when he characterized the Eightieth Congress the worst Congress in history. We are going to be called upon to repudiate the action of the Eightieth Congress in passing the Taft-Hartley bill. I am told by my friend from Michigan that we are going to do that. If we do we will be repudiating the work of the Eightieth Congress and tacitly admitting that the President was right in his characterization of the Eightieth Congress. We are going to be called on to repudiate the action of the Eightieth Congress on the tax-reduction bill which we passed. If we do that, again we will be tacitly admitting to the people of this Nation that the President was right in his characterization of the Eightieth Congress.

We are going to be asked to repudiate the action of the Eightieth Congress on the Aiken bill, the long-term agricultural bill, with its flexible support prices. If we do that, again we will be tacitly admitting to the Nation that the President was right in his characterization of the Eightieth Congress.

Today we are being asked to repudiate the record of the Eightieth Congress in placing safeguards around the administration of the reciprocal-trade agreements, and that is all we did. We have no quarrel with the theory of the reciprocal-trade agreements; it is the way they are being administered that we criticize and want to correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] has expired.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. MACK] is recognized.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER] yesterday, I thought, spoke rather scornfully and sarcastically about the tens of thousands of American fishermen who engage in the hazardous employment of going down to the sea to bring food for the American people.

When the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES] expressed concern over the future of the fisheries of New England the gentleman from Pennsylvania ridiculed the thought that anyone should entertain any concern about fishermen.

"Why," said the gentleman from Pennsylvania, "the average fisherman last year had earnings of $5,000." Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania added, "of course, in 1945, they only made $4,500." And then he remarked, I thought, rather sarcastically, "the poor fisherman." I gathered from his remarks that he looks upon fishermen as the aristocracy of labor and, therefore, in his opinion, entitled to very little consideration by the Democratic majority of this Congress.

It may be true, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania said, that the average American fisherman in 1948 made $5,000. It may be true that the fisherman made $4,500 in 1945. But what about 1946 and 1947? The gentleman did not mention fishermen's earnings for those years. It may be that in those years the average fisherman did not make much more than enough money to pay for his groceries and the gasoline to operate his fishing craft.

In all the businesses in which the risk capital of Americans is employed the fishing industry is the most hazardous. A fisherman has a good year and he may make $5,000. Then he may have one, two, or three bad years in which he does not earn enough for the upkeep of his boat. If it were not for a good year now and then no one would be engaging in commercial fishing.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, yesterday, in discussing the annual fish catch of the United States remarked that the American fish take is now double what it was in the prewar years. Then he added, rather sarcastically, I thought, "So they"—meaning the fishermen—"need a lot of protection." By this, I took the gentleman from Pennsylvania to mean that American fishermen are entitled to no protection whatever. Since the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a member of the Ways and Means Committee I am wondering if it is the position of the Democratic Party that our American fishermen are entitled to no protection whatever against the low-wage, low-living standard competition of foreign nations.

Now, it is probably true that fish production is considerably higher than in the prewar years. There are many reasons for that. During the war years, due to heavy naval operations, many foreign fishing boats were destroyed. There has not yet been time to rebuild these foreign fishing fleets. The foreign fishermen have not yet gotten back to prewar production and had time to create these prewar surpluses which they formerly dumped in the United States.

If, when they do get back into full production, no protection is afforded our American fishermen the great fishing industry that has been built up in this country during the war years will be greatly reduced. If that happens, the millions of dollars Americans have invested in canneries and other millions that thousands of little fishermen have invested in fishing boats and fishing gear will become largely worthless

This bill gives to the State Department the right to pass a life and death sentence upon every business and every community in this country that may be adversely affected by foreign imports. This bill gives to the State Department the right to say what businesses shall be destroyed and what businesses shall be permitted to live. This bill gives to the State Department the power to say what workers shall be permitted to continue in their present employment and what workers will be forced to give up their jobs and go and seek work elsewhere in other fields than those in which they are now engaged.

When such vast powers are given to any executive department of the Government they should be surrounded with every safeguard to protect the welfare of the people. One of the safeguards that should be provided is that of permitting the Tariff Commission to establish peril points below which, in the interest of the well-being of our American economy, no tariff should be reduced. Another of the safeguards needed is the escape clause.

If these reasonable safeguards are placed in the reciprocal-trade-treaty bill I shall vote for this bill. If they are not placed in this bill I shall, in the interest of thousands of fishermen of the Pacific coast, of nut growers, shingle mill employees, pulp and paper mill employees and others, be compelled to vote against it.

THE CRAB INDUSTRY

Let me tell you of what has happened to one fishing industry of the Pacific coast, that of crab fishing.

Prior to December 7, 1941, of all canned crab marketed in the United States 85 percent was imported from Japan. Our American crab fishermen and American cannery workers could not compete with the low-wage, low-living standards of Japanese cannery workers and Japanese fishermen.

When the Japs bombed Pearl Harbor they blasted themselves out of the American crab market. Americans built boats in American yards giving employment to American workers. In 1948 the crab-fishing business of the Pacific coast was 18 times what it was in 1941 and in the years prior to 1941. Thousands of American fishermen and cannery workers are now engaged in catching and processing crab.

If, through unwise treaties negotiated by the State Department, the Japanese are permitted to reenter the American crab market, then the time may come when Japanese canned crab again will control 85 percent of our American market.

If that is permitted to happen, the millions of dollars Americans have invested in crab-fishing boats and crab-fishing gear will be largely useless and worthless. Our American fishermen and cannery workers can no more compete with Japanese low wages and low living standards today than they could in 1941. If Japan again takes over our American crab market as she did in the years prior to 1942, our crab canneries will be idle and thousands of cannery workers out of employment.

What may happen to the crab industry may happen to many other fishing enterprises, our American tuna, bottom fish, salmon, and pilchards.

These fisheries ought to be protected at least to the point of giving them an opportunity to be heard by the Tariff Commission in establishing what are peril points, below which tariffs on fish should not be reduced. They ought to be protected at least to the point where if a treaty entered into begins to prove ruinous to an industry that there is an escape clause under which the United States Government may withdraw from such a disastrous treaty arrangement.

FILBERT NUTS

For the last half century Oregon and Washington have been a one-industry region, dependent almost solely on one industry—forest products. This dependency upon one industry frequently has led to severe booms and busts. To overcome this disadvantage our people have sought with vigor and intelligence to diversify their economic structure. Among the new diversified industries which have been developed are cranberry raising, bulb growing, and filbert raising.

Within recent years 850 filbert orchards have come into bearing in western Washington alone and more orchards, of later planting, are reaching year by year the bearing stage. These filbert orchards have progressed so far toward meeting the domestic demand for these nuts that the price on filberts, which was 27.5 cents a pound to growers in 1945, by 1948 had declined to 13.5 cents a pound, or less than half the price of 4 years ago.

If, under reciprocal-trade treaties, the duty on filberts or other nuts sold in competition to them, were to be lowered many of these orchards would be cut down and the trees, which required years of cultivation to reach a productive stage, would be converted into fuel, with tremendous financial loss to the orchardists and unemployment for their employees.

This bill, as a very minimum, should provide the safeguard to the nut growers that would exist if we maintain the Tariff Commission as an agency to set peril points below which no tariff reduction should go and an escape clause that will let us withdraw from any tariff agreement that time and experience proves is ruinous to any American industry.

CEDAR SHINGLES

We on the Pacific coast are familiar with how ruinous and unwise tariff arrangement may be to an industry. From time to time, we have seen thousands of our shingle weavers thrown into enforced idleness because through unsound and unwise treaties we had given away our shingle market to the Canadians.

The Canadians were permitted to export large shingle quotas into the United States under a treaty agreement.

When building was brisk and the demand for shingles so great that United States mills could not meet the demand our shingle-mill employees had jobs. However, whenever building slows down, it is the Canadian mills which supply the bulk of the American market with shingles while our own American shingle-mill workers walk the streets and they and their families go hungry.

The shingle weavers, like our American fishermen, cannot compete with the lower wages that prevail in Canadian shingle mills and Canadian logging camps.

With the wages in the Canadian lumber industry today 40 percent below those prevailing on the United States side of the border, it is impossible for our American shingle weavers to compete with the Canadian shingles.

Before we grant any concessions to Canada on shingles we ought to first consider what effect these concessions will have upon United States employment. Maintenance of the Tariff Commission to fix peril points below which no tariff should be reduced will help to do that.

If the majority permits some amendments to this bill and thereby will give our American industries and American workers assurance that they will not be sold down the river by the State Department I will vote for this bill. If the majority will not approve such amendments I shall be compelled in the interest of thousands of workers whom I represent to vote against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES] is recognized.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I yield for a question.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I would like to have the gentleman from Massachusetts tell the House about how many fishermen owed the boat money previous to 1939 when they came in from their catch.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the 4 minutes allotted to me to discuss the very important matters affecting the industries of New England is entirely too short a time. We heard much said yesterday about gag rule. If this is not gag rule, restricting to 4 minutes a Member of this House, representing as many of us do, the great industrial areas of this country that need protection in years to come if this bill should become law, I do not know what is a gag rule. I shall not therefore be able to answer every question that will be asked in regard to this matter; but I am very interested, of course, in answering the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER], who yesterday in a very slighting way referred to the fishermen and the occupation they follow in their hazardous work on the high seas. He said yesterday that in the testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means, notwithstanding the tremendous imports of fish in the last 50 years, that the sum total of all the imports of fish brought into this country could be brought in in six boats. Now, of course, as I said to you yesterday, there must have been some misunderstanding of the question and there was a misunderstanding in the giving of the answers.

The facts are, Mr. Chairman, that since 1939 imports of fish—and let me emphasize fish because it is an important part of our food supply—very vitally affect many of the communities along the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Gulf coasts. In one particular city in my district alone over 60 percent of the industrial wages flow from that particular industry; namely, in the city of Gloucester, Mass., the oldest fishing port in the United States. In 1939 when they had remonstrance meetings in the city of Gloucester, when parades were the order of the day in protest of the heavy imports of fillet fish, that year the imports amounted to a little over 9,000,000 pounds and constituted only 10 percent of the total output of the New England fishing industry. But last year, 1948, instead of being 9,000,000 pounds it was 54,000,000 pounds; instead of being 10 percent of the total output last year it was 38 percent of the output of the New England fishing industry.

A similar situation applied a few years ago in the shoe industry when so many shoes were being imported from Czechoslovakia. Out of 28 factories in one city in my district making that particular type of shoe, 18 had closed their doors and the other 10 were in various stages of liquidation; and it was only as a result of the German march into Czechoslovakia in the spring of 1938 that we saved that shoe city where 70 percent of all the wages flowed from that industry.

Are we going to permit the same situation to arise again? Or are we going to have some protective clauses in this bill whereby the industry itself as well as the industry and the officials of those communities may come to Washington and plead before some agency of Government—not the Committee on Reciprocity Information, but some committee which will take notice of what they are saying and of their effort to save this industry in that part of the country?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. All time on section 1 has expired.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948 (Public Law 792, 80th Cong.) is hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. The period during which the President is authorized to enter into foreign trade agreements under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended and extended, is hereby extended for a further period of 3 years from June 12, 1948.

SEC. 4. Section 350 (a) of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, is hereby further amended by deleting the following therefrom: "In the present emergency in restoring the American standard of living, in overcoming domestic unemployment and the present economic depression, in increasing the purchasing power of the American public, and".

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania talk about the Waltham Watch Co. This concern is not located in my district but it is in the United States; and during the war, Mr. Chairman, that company did precision work for the United States Government in connection with dropping bombs and everything on our enemies. Then we allowed the Swiss who did not do anything for anybody to come in here and grab the watch companies' business. Now, I am not crying about them and I am not crying about any other unfair thing we have done in our tariff acts. I am sold, Mr. Chairman, on a protective tariff that takes care of the workingmen in this country and I am going to do that as long as I am here and as long as I am alive. I am working for the interests of the laboring man, not for the so-called labor leaders who come in and try to scare us to death by telling us we will not get elected again. Most of us do not care anything about them. We serve our country first.

The gentleman from Massachusetts told you about the fishing industry. I can remember when those fellows who went out there and sacrificed their lives to give you food owed the boat money when they came in. Certainly in 1943, 1944, and 1945 they made a lot of money.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. And those fishermen are not restricted to the 8-hour day or the 40-hour week. It is every day in the week and mostly every week in the month.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for adding something that I was about to say. Every time they go out they take their very lives in their hands. They come in with ice on their boats 10 inches thick to give you and me something to eat. They are entitled to everything they can get.

Mr. Chairman, I do not object to anyone standing up here on the floor and making his point, but when they talk about domestic things and the safety of the public, and when a company goes out and does everything that the United States Government asks them to do, then you allow a foreign country to send in parts of watches or anything else at half the price we can produce, we just cannot understand that. I do not believe anyone, whether he comes from California, Texas, Florida, or Massachusetts, believes any differently.

All we are asking here is that you see that the man who works for a living in this country gets a break. That is all we are asking. If you vote for that principle you will not be hurt in your district and I will not be hurt in mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. Section 4 of the act entitled "An act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930," approved June 12, 1934, as amended (U. S. C., 1946 edition, title 19, sec. 1354), is hereby amended by striking out the matter following the semicolon and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "and before concluding such agreement the President shall seek information and advice with respect thereto from the United States Tariff Commission, from the Departments of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, from the National Military Establishment, and from such other sources as he may deem appropriate."

SEC. 6. Section 350 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended (U. S. Code, 1946, title 19, sec. 1351 (b)), is amended by changing the colon to a period, by deleting the proviso, and by adding the following: "Nothing in this act shall be construed to preclude the application to any product of Cuba (including products preferentially free of duty) of a rate of duty not higher than the rate applicable to the like products of other foreign countries (except the Philippines), whether or not the application of such rate involves any preferential customs treatment. No rate of duty on products of Cuba shall in any case be decreased by more than 50 percent of the rate of duty, however established, existing on January 1, 1945 (even though temporarily suspended by act of Congress)."

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania: At the end of the bill add a new section as follows:

"SEC. 7. Before entering into negotiations concerning any proposed foreign trade agreement under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, the President shall furnish the United States Tariff Commission (hereinafter in this act referred to as the "Commission") with a list of all articles imported into the United States to be considered for possible modification of duties and other import restrictions, imposition of additional import restrictions, or continuance of existing customs or excise treatment. Upon receipt of such list the Commission shall make an investigation and report to the President the findings of the Commission with respect to each such article as to (1) the limit to which such modification, imposition, or continuance may be extended in order to carry out the purpose of such section 350 without causing or threatening serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or similar articles; and (2) if increases in duties or additional import restrictions are required to avoid serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or similar articles the minimum increases in duties or additional import restrictions required. Such report shall be made by the Commission to the President not later than 120 days after the receipt of such list by the Commission."

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this is the proposed amendment which you have heard described as the peril-point amendment. It is designed to provide by law that the President shall request of the Tariff Commission the findings of what we describe as a peril point before the President or his negotiators proceed with the negotiation of any future trade agreements. Each of us must know that there is a point below which any tariff cut can lead to serious damage or injury, or actual injury, to any domestic industry presently protected by a tariff. The peril point is that point. There is no way at all under existing law by which the President can ascertain that particular point. The only group in the United States with long experience in doing just exactly this work is the Tariff Commission. They can find as a fact whether or not a tariff cut is apt to be disadvantageous or advantageous to our country's economy.

The Tariff Commission is, as you all know, in reality, an agent of the Congress. It is set up to provide the Congress—and specifically the respective committees of the Congress—with detailed information for the benefit of the Congress in determining our position upon tariffs and other matters affecting imports and exports. The Tariff Commission is able to do the job. The Tariff Commission is today doing the job, and I submit that for the protection of American industry, for the assistance of the President and the negotiators, this amendment should be adopted. With its adoption, our negotiators, when going abroad to practice their skill at Yankee trading, will have had established as a guide a figure which a group of nonpartisan, independent experts in tariff matters have agreed is the point below which any cuts, if made, would threaten or actually cause damage to a particular industry in our country.

I submit, gentlemen, that those of you who are interested in protecting American industry cannot logically refuse to support this amendment. If interested in protecting American industry, this is the very minimum amendment that should be included in this bill. Such a person cannot logically oppose it. After the peril point is determined, cuts should not be made below it in tariffs. However, if made, we will do so with our eyes open. If for political or other considerations the peril point is disregarded, great damage will be done to American industry.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. Will the gentleman state whether or not this was the real gist of the measure which was passed in 1948, H. R. 6556?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. This was a part of the act of 1948.

Mr. CARROLL. But this is the real issue at stake in this whole thing?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. We were entirely unable to get before our committee those men who could have answered the gentleman's question more exactly as to just what the purpose of the act this year is. However, in the act of 1948, the finding of those facts is required. As the gentleman knows, under the act of 1948 the President had to make public the amount recommended by the Tariff Commission as the minimum below which we should not cut, if he saw fit to go below that point. Under the proposed amendment, the fact of the finding will be secret to everyone save the President. He will have the information. He will never have to disclose it. Consequently, our negotiators in the future will not be embarrassed by publicity having been given to the findings of the Tariff Commission.

To those of you who want this trade-agreement program continued, to those of you who want the President to have the true facts found by a group of nonpartisan, independent, capable members of the Tariff Commission available to the President as a guide, I say that I can see no reason why you should oppose this amendment.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, of course the real purpose of this amendment is to kill the pending bill. That is the only practical purpose it could serve, and it is designed and intended for that purpose.

The act passed by our Republican friends last year contained just two things, for all practical purposes. One was that it continued the trade-agreements program for just 1 year when it should have continued it for 3 years, and the other was that it provided this so-called peril-point procedure, which was for the purpose of hamstringing and making the program unworkable. That is what it was intended for and that is the purpose it serves.

There is no practical reason for placing this provision in this bill or in this program. Every step of the way in the negotiation of a trade agreement affords an ample peril point. Every care and caution is exercised in the negotiation of these trade agreements under the original program, which the pending bill seeks to reestablish. The members of the Departmental Committee, the members of the Committee for Reciprocity Information, and those engaged in the negotiation of the trade agreement, have all of the data and information and material available before them all the time, and use extreme caution and great care in every step that is taken to see to it that no American interest will be seriously affected by any trade agreement that is negotiated.

Under the pending bill, providing for the original procedure to be again established, a member of the Tariff Commission occupies a position among those who actually negotiate the trade agreements. All of the material that is available to him as a member of the Commission is there considered by all of those engaged in these negotiations.

Certainly there is no reason for making this requirement except to so far hamper and restrict the negotiations as to make it impossible for any desirable results to be accomplished. The member of the Tariff Commission who serves with those negotiating the agreement, as well as any other member of the committee, has the duty and is required, if he disagrees with the majority opinion, to file his minority view. Those views have to be submitted to the President when he passes on these things. So from every practical and reasonable standpoint, a thoroughly adequate peril point is provided every step of the way. There is no reason for including this amendment in this bill and no purpose could be served by including it except to restore the provisions of the act of 1948. That is the only thing that could be accomplished by it. The Chairman of the Tariff Commission himself, appearing before the Senate Finance Committee on the bill considered last year, made the statement in effect that this plan proposed by this amendment was unworkable and undesirable. Therefore, there is no reason for giving favorable consideration to this amendment and to include it in this bill. I simply say that the only purpose to be served by it is to kill the pending bill and restore the Republican act of 1948. The very reason for our being here today is to try to remove the restrictive amendments imposed at that time and thus make it possible for us to go on with this program as it was originally designed and intended and which has meant so much to the people of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, someday I am going to get the answer to a question which bothers me a great deal, and that is why the majority Members must always feel that every amendment submitted to a piece of legislation by the minority side has as its only purpose and principal design the killing of the measure under consideration. I say to the gentleman who preceded me, and to the Democratic Members of the House, that my support of this amendment is in no way designed to interfere with the proper carrying out of a trade-agreements program. It is in no way designed to kill the legislation. In fact, my individual position is that I want us to be in a position to continue to negotiate agreements with other countries. Unless, however, there is at least this little protection, this little consideration given to our domestic economy, I cannot support the program. I say to the gentleman that if this amendment is adopted, if this little concern is shown for our domestic economy, I will support, and support vigorously, the passage of H. R. 1211.

So I resent personally, and for my fellow members on the Ways and Means Committee who share my views, the intimation of the gentlemen who say that our only purpose in introducing this amendment is to kill the legislation. That is absolutely not correct.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. If the gentleman is so concerned about these amendments, will the gentleman explain to the committee why it was that this bill was brought before the House last year with a gag rule prohibiting any amendments?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. May I say to the gentleman we are not debating what happened last year. We are debating a specific proposal before us today. We have an issue now confronting us. It is nice to live in the past, but, as for me, I would rather live today and for the future. We have committed sins, of course. But who among us is there who has not?

Now, let us go to the fundamental proposition involved in the peril-point amendment, the position of the Tariff Commission in relation to the trade-agreements program. The basic issue is whether we are going to eliminate the Tariff Commission completely from any real part in the determination of our policy in negotiating with other countries on trade agreements. The contention is made that the Tariff Commission today is part and parcel of the negotiations; that they are members of the Trade Agreements Committee; that they have membership on the Committee for Reciprocity Information. Yes. They do have members there, but the Commission at no time, as a commission of six men appointed on a bipartisan basis—at no time does that Commission act as a commission in any determination with regard to the rates of duty. Surely, they have a member, but that member never has spoken as the spokesman for the Commission. I refer you to hearing after hearing, and particularly you can look at page 51 of these hearings, where we quote the testimony of Mr. Ryder, Chairman of the Commission, in previous hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, in which he states, as Chairman of the Commission and as a member of these various committees, that he did not speak in the name of the Tariff Commission as a group. There has been no such thing as a determination by the Commission. That is what we are asking. We have this Commission; why not use it? Why not have them give this advice to the President? They say the negotiators have all this information that the Tariff Commission might find. I will agree that the negotiators do, and the Committee on Trade Agreements have all of the material that the Tariff Commission can furnish to them. But it is not made available to the President of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES] has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to object, but I thought it was understood we would try to move along and not ask for additional time.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I was not aware of that. If you had such an agreement, I will withdraw the request.

Mr. COOPER. We did not have a definite agreement, but I thought that was understood. I do not say there was any definite agreement, but it was my understanding that we would try to move along and not ask for additional time. I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. As I said, there is no question but what all of the facts and information that are available to the Tariff Commission are made available by them to the Committee on Trade Agreements, and also to the negotiators; but the point I want to make, and the point that I think is very important in the procedure to be followed in entering into these agreements, is the fact that the President of the United States does not have available any determinations by the Tariff Commission. Why? Because the information that goes to the President goes to him from the Trade Agreements Committee. Under the procedure, the Trade Agreements Committee meets, and they find out various phases of the problem, and then they submit it to the President prior to going over and actually entering into negotiations with foreign countries. The right is given to members of the Trade Agreements Committee to file dissenting opinions with the President, but there is nothing there which provides that any impartial agency of this Government such as the Tariff Commission shall give to the President of the United States the facts which he can balance against the advice and opinions given to him by the Committee on Reciprocity or the Trade Agreements Committee.

There is nothing in the procedure contemplated under H. R. 1211 that will provide such information. By the amendment under consideration, we call upon the Tariff Commission, a bipartisan, factual agency, and we say to them, "Help the President to the extent of establishing what your facts, your information, lead you to believe is the peril point." There is a big difference, a very big difference, between the provisions of this act as we propose to amend it today and the provision which was contained in the 1948 act. In the 1948 act we required that the peril points established by the Tariff Commission be made public upon those occasions when they were exceeded by the President or by the negotiators. That has been removed. The purpose of this amendment is entirely to make available and put before the President information of an unbiased, unprejudiced nature. There is no question in the world but that—and anybody who has studied the operations of this program at all will admit it—this program is dominated from top to bottom today by the State Department. In my judgment and in the judgment of the minority members of the Committee on Ways and Means, provision should be made for an impartial agency to determine on a factual basis the extent to which our rates of duty can be lowered in order that the program can be carried out on a sound, sane basis for the protection of our country, with particular reference to our economy and our national defense and security.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman knows—everybody does—that the Constitution provides that the Congress shall have the sole responsibility of laying and collecting tariffs, does it not?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. That is right.

Mr. JENKINS. Under the present practice, the Congress has very little to say. Is that right?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. In practice we really do not have anything at all to say.

Mr. JENKINS. We have practically nothing to say. The effect of the amendment on which the gentleman is speaking will simply be that the Tariff Commission, which is an agency constitutionally set up by the Congress of the United States, is bypassed entirely and is given no consideration.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Yes; it is our purpose to see to it that we have some agency which is not bound up with international diplomacy and international politics; some agency that has no concern except the economy of our own country, our own industry, and our own labor; an agency that will give to the President unbiased information as to where we should stop in the matter of lowering a duty.

May I say, too, that this proposal is not entirely restrictive. There are occasions when it is to the advantage of the negotiators to know how low they can go. There may be a situation whereby the findings of the Tariff Commission would give the Trade Agreements Committee and the President reasons to believe that they could reduce the duty much lower than they themselves thought they could. It thus increases their bargaining power; it is not just a one-way street.

Mr. Chairman, I hope you will not be guided by some of the prejudices that have entered into this debate, but will look at it from an honest, practical viewpoint.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, let us assume, for the purpose of argument, that my friend from Pennsylvania and my friend from Wisconsin are very sincere in offering the amendment which they have discussed and that they desire to improve the reciprocal-trade-agreements program as a result of this amendment. I have no desire to impugn the motives of these friends; I can, however, I believe, take issue with their judgment. I believe I know what they have in mind accomplishing. I want to point out as best I can that the very purpose they intend to accomplish here is provided for already. The action they now propose to us and this committee is unnecessary and absolutely unworkable.

Why do I say it is unnecessary? Their amendment would require the Tariff Commission to report to the President within 120 days on the so-called peril point of each item being considered in negotiations with other countries. There is nothing in the present law, there is nothing in this act, which prevents the President, if he desires to have that information, from calling upon the Tariff Commission under H. R. 1211 to supply him with the information.

Every bit of information that could be made available to the President of the United States under this amendment is made available at all times to those who engage in this matter of negotiating trade agreements. Nothing will be accomplished and it is absolutely unnecessary.

How is it unworkable? Let us take the present situation. The Tariff Commission has under consideration right now 400 items that were included in the President's list of those to be considered in April. The act of 1948 required that the Tariff Commission report back to the President within 120 days how low these items could be cut without injuring the industries of the United States—120 days to consider 400 items. How many items does that mean the Tariff Commission must consider in one day? Approximately three items per day, if they work Saturday and Sunday. The Tariff Commission has only 200 employes, including elevator operators, the folks who clean up around the Tariff Commission, stenographers, and a very, very few economists. There are very few people in the Commission who are sufficiently skilled to consider this particular point. How many of them would be available within 120 days to determine peril points? Notwithstanding how many staff personnel might be available, the Commission would have to turn out three decisions a day. What this amendment requires in connection with the Annecy negotiation is for the six members of the Tariff Commission to be able to make up their minds within 120 days on 400 items. The next time we may have a thousand items, but still the decision would have to be made in 120 days.

My argument and my objection to the amendment are that you require the Tariff Commission to do something physically impossible. You want a scientific investigation made, but you force the Tariff Commission to give a snap judgment. I think I heard you Republicans complaining in the 1948 campaign that snap judgment had been used. Now you are trying to force this administration into the position of using nothing but snap judgment.

It will not work. This is what would happen if the pending amendment were adopted. You and I know, all of us who have been here any length of time know, that there is never a report or a statement of findings made to the President of the United States that does not leak out in some way. To whom does it leak? It leaks out to the very people who want most to know the information. So what do they do? They awaken to the fact that the Tariff Commission has said that a reduction in duty below this point may injure us. They go back to the Tariff Commission, after the negotiations and the approval of the agreement, and they say, "Our case is made, Mr. Tariff Commissioners. You have already decided ahead of time what the peril point is. So now grant us the relief we ask."

Mr. Chairman, the establishment of a peril point is not going to bring relief to the watch industry, if it needs relief; it is not going to bring relief to the fishing industry or to any other industry in the United States. It is merely going to becloud the whole situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin, a moment ago expressed considerable chagrin and personal feeling because the thought had been advanced here that these amendments were being offered for the purpose of killing the legislation now before us. Without questioning his good faith, I think we might examine the record of his party insofar as reciprocal-trade programs are involved to acertain whether or not any representative of the Republican Party is genuinely sincere in saying that he favors the program if certain amendments are adopted.

Many of you Members were here and participated in these debates, but I would like to refresh your memory on the legislative history of the reciprocal-trade program. The first vote was in the year 1934. In that year 269 Democrats voted aye and 2 Republicans voted aye. In 1937, when the first extension came up, the Democrats made real progress. They brought in one more Republican. Three Republicans voted for the reciprocal-trade program, 278 Democrats voted for it, and 81 Republicans voted against it. In 1940, however, we lost ground. We slipped back. Again, only two Members of the Republican Party voted for the reciprocal-trade program with 212 Democrats voting for it. In 1943, under the exigencies of war, we secured some temporary converts. One hundred and forty-five members of the Republican Party lapsed from their old doctrine of high protectionism and voted for the reciprocal-trade program, but not for long, because when it came up again in 1945, the number dropped back to 33, with 205 Democrats voting for the program. Never have there been more than 12 Democrats, in the 15-year history of this program, opposing it.

Now, it seems, too, that the gentleman from Wisconsin, when he protests injury to his feelings, should have his memory refreshed just a little bit. The gentleman from Wisconsin sat on the Gearhart subcommittee last year which brought out the so-called extension of the Reciprocal Trade Act in this House. It came to this floor under a gag rule whereby no amendments were permitted, and the bill as it passed the House was described by the then Secretary of State, the great General Marshall, as being worse than no bill at all. So, it seems to me that in light of the record it can very well be said that those who sponsor this amendment are actually attempting to destroy and discredit this great reciprocal-trade program, and it is in line with Republican principles over the entire history of that party.

Let me cite from the platform of the Republican Party of a few years ago. Here is what was said:

> We will repeal the present Reciprocal Trade Agreements Law. It is futile, and it is dangerous. Its effect on agriculture and industry has been destructive. Its continuation would work to the detriment of the wage earner and the farmer.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I leave to the good judgment of the members of the committee the question of who is in good faith on the extension of the reciprocal-trade-treaty program.

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Chairman, I belive in and will vote to extend the trade-treaties program that is now before us. But I do believe that in granting the powers requested for the executive department of our Government, that the Congress of the United States should reserve some power of review to study and analyze their effect upon the trade and commerce of the United States. I believe it would be wise and prudent for this body to insist that the Tariff Commission, at the request of Congress, be authorized to find the limits within which tariff reductions may be made without injury to our American producers.

The pottery producers of my district are disturbed and alarmed at the increased importation of household china that is now taking place.

In 10 months of 1948, these importations regularly increased in volume, as follows:

|---|---|
| January | $312,300 |
| February | 234,200 |
| March | 337,200 |
| April | 297,000 |
| May | 368,000 |
| June | 406,900 |
| July | 335,700 |
| August | 549,500 |
| September | 456,400 |
| October | 536,400 |

The difference in the amount of wages and the standard of living in the various countries being so great and uncertain makes it impossible to meet this threat to American industry by specific duties applied to all foreign countries alike, as was done in former tariff laws.

It becomes necessary to have a tax that is not specific, but a tax system that can be applied to imports from every such import country in a fair and impartial manner, so as to apply to each of said countries equally, and this can only be accomplished by a separate trade treaty with each export nation.

In the whole world there are not three countries where our rates of duty apply equally to the cost of production. When duties are set at a point which sell merchandise of some countries at a higher rate than others, our rate does not protect us or even any other country who sells us goods and who pays its workmen better than starvation wages.

An example will show what this bill will do to protect our trade and commerce against the dictator nations of the world who have no interest in international integrity or fairness with other than totalitarian nations who depend on money and currencies without value and employment at a fixed and dictated wage.

Compound duties, ad valorem and specific rates, if applied in a case where we assume the American wholesale price to be 75 cents and imports from one country 50 cents, a compound duty of 30 percent, plus 10 cents, would suffice and equal the American price, 75 cents.

However, if this compound duty were applied to a 25-cent cost of same article in some other country of import, the effect would be to bring it to only 42½ cents. This bill would equalize by adding the difference in any advantage given to such country by debased moneys and currencies by an increased tariff tax to place such imports on an exact footing in a competitive market.

TARIFF

The rational view of the tariff today is to secure only tariff for protection. As a revenue measure, it is of minor significance. The sole question is to learn the degree and methods of determining the amount of protection and the selection of industries and items which need protection against excessive imports.

We are the largest and greatest producer in the world; therefore, our tariffs should be adopted to protect these interests, as a large majority of our people are engaged in production, with a rate of duty high enough to protect the average producer. But to protect all producers under such a theory of tariff is impossible, because it has been found that technological progress is not uniform.

The largest firms, of course, are in the forefront in the installation of the most modern equipment and process. Small firms may lack the advantage of larger and better-equipped factories, and therefore may be in need of greater protection. These and other various items create a great problem in determining the average or normal producer.

Then again there are yet greater problems in the items of import. The cost of production differs largely in the various countries, also the relative parity of the moneys of the different countries from which imports are brought to the United States.

In the year 1947, decorated household china was shipped to us by 32 countries, of which four accounted for 80 percent. These were Japan, Germany, France, and China. Two were European countries and two Asiatic, represented by distinct standards of living and unequal competitive levels, yet the rate of duty was the same for all.

A single rate of duty in such instances frustrates the very function of a protective tariff. There can be no individual rate of duty equally applicable to all countries exporting their goods to America.

Of course, we assess our duties on the foreign invoice value of imports. We should substitute domestic value, but this alone would not take care of the difference in the value of foreign currencies, when compared to the value of the American dollar, nor would it always meet the problem of competitive differentials.

EQUALITY OF COMPETITION

In our tariff legislation, heretofore we enacted equal tax rates, that applied to all countries alike, regardless of the low standard of wages in most of them.

It seems to me, tariff rates, if they are to protect producers from such low-standard countries, must be fixed to equalize the equality of competition, rather than equality of rates. Of course, the most simple and direct method of producing equality of competition among the countries that export to us is to apply different rates of duty, depending upon the competitive level of such countries.

Since it has been the accepted theory in all countries that tariffs are only enacted to safeguard producers who are in need of protection against competition based on low wages and low standards of living, we must recognize the fact that this can only be done by a tariff rate that will fit the competitive factors prevailing among the different countries that export goods to us. Such a tariff, of course, would require detailed data and proper study of all conditions entering into the production in such countries.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

I believe the State Department, as an instrument of foreign policy, should continue to have the right to enter into trade treaties with foreign nations, but I also believe that an amendment to the trade agreement should be added that would enable the Tariff Commission to find the limits within which further reductions are to be held if we desire to prevent injury to domestic industry.

The Tariff Commission is a creature of Congress, and is the only organization of the Government that was set up and staffed with specialized and technical knowledge and training to adjust the tariff within prescribed limits authorized by Congress. It is the only agency in a position to make necessary inquiries and investigations for the purposes of proper tariff enactments and adjustments of the tariff that become necessary because of shifting economic conditions.

The results of our trade agreements made within the past 10 years should be reviewed. The Tariff Commission is the proper Government organization and the only Government body competent to review and report on the effects and changes necessary in all the trade agreements heretofore or hereafter entered into by the State Department with foreign nations.

And we should amend our tariff law of 1930, so that the valuation of imported goods should be taxed solely on the wholesale value of such merchandise in America and not on the value of the inflated yen.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in not to exceed 15 minutes after the gentleman from Michigan concludes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. LODGE. May I say to the gentleman from Michigan that personally I regret very much that partisanship has been injected into this issue by the gentleman from Louisiana. This is an important implement of foreign policy, and I feel that it is entitled not to be treated as a political football.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, it has been my great privilege to live in different sections of this country. I think I know what it means to the man who grows wool, mohair, beef and hides, pecans, peanuts, rice, and sugarcane, all in the Southern States, to have protection for his enterprise. As one who has southern blood in my veins, I can think in terms of protecting southern commodities the same as western and northern commodities. But in no way do I overlook northern agriculture and industry. I know what it is to have industry in the Northern States and to participate in farming in the West and the Northwest, which I think needs a little protection now and then, so I can look at this picture, I think, from about as many angles as any Member who sits on this floor.

This is not a political question so far as I am concerned, but I take the position that it is more important to protect all the industry, and all the jobs of all our people, than it is to protect any policy which may be promoted by this Government if that policy runs contrary to the interests of our people and the general welfare. Certainly Members of Congress and Congress as a whole and the President can get off on the wrong road once in a while, and when we are on the wrong road we can have the wrong policy. Many fine and capable workers are now losing their jobs as the administration continues to ask for billions of dollars to continue gifts to other nations in the name of defense.

My friend from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS] has argued that this amendment would impose on the Tariff Commission an impossible job with respect to the 120 days. I have no sympathy whatever for that kind of an argument. If the Tariff Commission is not sufficiently informed on these major commodities and major issues, which the President may propose from time to time, to give a report of that kind within 120 days, then we had better fire the Tariff Commission and get somebody on the Commission who is on the job and knows what is going on. But I am sure the Commission can do the job.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. If the Tariff Commission cannot do it, how, pray, can the State Department or the Committee for Reciprocity Information do it?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly I think the argument of the gentleman from Arkansas is absolutely unfounded, and without substantial foundation.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. The Tariff Commission has over 200 experts, and they practically have their job done ahead of time now.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Of course they do. You would not have a Tariff Commission worth a tinker's darn if it could not do that.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. The Tariff Commission at the present time is turning out three and more such findings per day.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Why, sure.

Those who supported the foreign policy of this country the last few years, and I refer specifically to the Marshall plan as well as lend-lease, have gotten themselves over a barrel with respect to this trade-agreement program.

When the Bretton Woods agreement was before the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I am not sure my friend the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS] was then a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, Mr. William Green, of the A. F. of L., was before our committee, recommending the approval of Bretton Woods agreement. You will find several pages of cross-examination where I put right straight to him cold-blooded this kind of a question. I said:

Mr. Green, when the goods produced in other countries start flowing back into this country against your workers and your union members, throwing them out of job, what do you propose to do?

His reply in substance was, and you will find this in volume 2 of the hearings, which I read only yesterday afternoon, that the Government of the United States must guarantee to the workers of this country that their standard of living, and this relates to their wages, will not be reduced.

I inquired:

What is your formula for effectuating such a guaranty?

Mr. Green had not had time to work up the formula.

Of course, if you collect back these advances that you are making to these other countries, you will have to do it through the importation into this country of work in the form of goods by those who work in other parts of the world. When you begin doing that, you will close industries, create unemployment, and destroy the flow of national and social income in this country, and you will throw your Secretary of the Treasury charged with the management of a quarter of a trillion dollar debt, into a very bad predicament. That is what you will face if you expect to collect for these gifts which you know you are making. I do not think you are going to collect substantially from any of the countries. That is a reason, only one reason, that I have not supported this give-away program because there is a bottom to our meal barrel. This is not a limitless cornucopia that we are operating here in the United States. I am in favor of the amendment and hope that it will be adopted. We shall find in the coming months it is necessary to have jobs and production in this country if we are to meet budgets and our obligations, internally and externally.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment. I am glad that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LODGE] raised the question as to partisan politics being brought into this debate by some of the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle. May I say at the outset that I am wholeheartedly supporting the President's European foreign policy of the Government of the United States. I am one of those who early supported it, and appreciated its value, not only insofar as the economic recovery of the western states of Europe is concerned, but also insofar as the future security of this country is concerned. This is a matter that cannot in any way be tied up with the foreign policy of our Government in a partisan manner. It seems to me that what we ought to do is to approach this question from the point of view of what is the over-all good for both our domestic and our foreign policy. With the support of the Marshall plan and the benefits that we hope will flow from that plan for the recovery of the 16 states of western Europe we also hope that we can sustain a high state of production and employment in this country.

This bill affects the very vitals of our own economy and the welfare of our own industry and of our own workers, our own pay rolls and our own purchasing power. The economic life of the Nation is involved in this measure which we are considering here today. In the State of Massachusetts in the past year, 1948, over $50,000,000 was paid out in unemployment compensation. That is $50,000,000, and the reserve fund is growing lower and lower every year. The reports that we are getting from many parts of the State are that unemployment is steadily on the increase.

This amendment simply provides that before any trade agreement is executed, that the Tariff Commission shall make a complete investigation and study of all the economic effects relating to the agreement that is to be considered and the adverse effects, if any, it would have upon our own domestic industries. We know that under the present Trade Agreements Act the benefits of the so-called most-favored-nation clause will now flow to all the Communist states of the world. We know that in those states behind the iron curtain they are developing so-called central export agencies in order to pool the resources of all the industries of those individual countries and then get the American dollar through the American market by sending their goods here, whether it be shoes, textiles or any other type of product which needs to get down below the selling price in the American market. That is a matter we should be deeply concerned about. This amendment, in my opinion, will be helpful in the protection of our own industries and the workers in the factories throughout the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES] has expired.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am the only member of the House today who took part in the conference between the House and Senate in 1939 on the strategic and critical materials stock pile, the original legislation in that field. From that day down to this I have been watching some phases of the national defense effort, that I had particular opportunity to look into during the 8 years I served on the Military Affairs Committee.

If the Simpson amendment is adopted, I could go along with this legislation. I want that safeguard, a determination of the peril points, because I have seen enough of the action of the State Department so far in handling reciprocal trade programs that I am not willing to subordinate national defense to their judgment, when that judgment is based on their diplomatic negotiations, rather than on the health of our essential industries, for our own national defense self-sufficiency.

I have looked carefully through Mr. Forrestal's statement in answer to my position in the committee, and he has not answered this point. I wish some Member on the majority side of the committee would get for me a specific statement from Forrestal that the peril point is not needed for national defense—specifically that statement; and then I will reserve my judgment as to whether he is sound in thus subordinating national defense, even if he should make that statement later.

We have a serious point. Some people argue that the escape clause is an adequate provision, yet, if it is adequate, why do you not put the escape clause in the Swiss agreements? There we get right down to a very vital point in national defense. Why do you not put the escape clause in the Swiss agreements? They are not there and you know they are not there. Then, when you get the escape clause in the Swiss agreements, let me admonish the Committee on Reciprocity Information to make some adequate use of that escape clause. Just read the statement by the mining industry on page 425 of the hearings:

In the experience of the mining industry, however, the escape clauses have been found to be of no practical value whatever, and no remedial action under these clauses has ever been taken, even where all the conditions specified therein have been shown to exist. So far as we can learn, out of the many hundreds of reductions in duty which have been made under the trade-agreements program, the escape clauses have been successfully invoked only in two minor instances, involving silver fox furs and embroidered handkerchiefs.

In the case of tungsten, in hearings held before the Committee for Reciprocity Information in January 1947, the committee assured industry representatives that their case was excellent and that they should have no fear of a tariff cut; nevertheless, the cut was made. Although further appeal was made 6 months after the cut, the Tariff Commission took the position that insufficient time had elapsed and that testimony could not be considered. It would appear that the industry must die completely before its case can be taken up.

Now that is a severe indictment. All I want is a proper system to give us effective protection when we approach the peril point, and then make effective use of the escape clause when we get it into the agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] for 4 minutes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON]. Those who favor this amendment and who oppose the bill before the House as written may have been converted to the principles of the reciprocal trade method of dealing with tariffs and foreign trade; but if they have—and I do not question their motives—but I will say, if they have, that conversion is as mysterious and as sudden as that of St. Paul. I fear, by the arguments they offer in support of the amendment, the scales have not yet fallen from their eyes.

Let us for a moment consider a little of the history of this reciprocal trade program. In the last Congress, when the present law was enacted, it will be remembered that the then majority, both in the Committee on Ways and Means and in the House, did not take the first step, if my memory is correct, to extend the reciprocal trade-agreements program. Instead, they waited until I, the ranking Democratic member on the committee, introduced a bill to extend the original law for another 3 years. Then they went into secret conclave behind closed doors, with the public shut out and the press excluded, and wrote the 1948 version of the reciprocal trade program.

In my humble judgment had we not taken that step of introducing the bill to extend the original reciprocal trade program, so that the Republicans could clearly see that the sentiment of the country was so overwhelmingly in favor of the reciprocal trade program, they would have just let the whole thing die. That is my opinion. But the sentiment of the country was so overwhelmingly in favor of the reciprocal trade method of dealing with tariffs that they did not dare do it after the question was raised.

As far as the question of sincerity is concerned, my good friend the gentleman from Wisconsin, a member of the committee, resents the suggestion that the majority members are not sincere. I do not pass on their sincerity, but I may say that one who lives in a glass house should not throw stones. His skin was so thin about some intimation that they might not have been sincere that, toward the end of his remarks, he turned to the majority and enjoined this side of the House not to be controlled or motivated by prejudice. While pleading for us to accept the sincerity of the minority, he suggests that we of the majority may be controlled and motivated by prejudice. It is not a question, Mr. Chairman, of sincerity; it is a question of what is right, what is just, what is fair, what is best for the economy of the American people.

As far as the peril point clause is concerned, the Chairman of the Tariff Commission, Mr. Ryder, in testifying before the Senate Finance Committee, said that the Tariff Commission was not constituted to formulate policy; they were constituted to furnish information; and the peril-point procedure required by the 1948 act meant the imposition upon them of the duty and the responsibility of formulating policy; consequently, he said, it was not practical; he said it was not workable.

Mr. Chairman, if we want a real, genuine reciprocal trade-agreements program let us realize that the program will not work if emasculated by crippling amendments and placed in a strait jacket. If you want a man to do a job, if you want the President of the United States to carry out this reciprocal-trade-agreements program, you must implement it the way he has asked that it should be implemented, the way the State Department says it should be implemented. We must write the law so it will work. It will not work under these amendments that are offered. The only thing to do, Mr. Chairman, is to pass this bill as it is written, not as it would be so severely crippled by such amendments as have been proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE] is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, in 1934 I opposed the bill giving to the President sole authority to enter into trade agreements with other nations because I felt that such reciprocal trade agreements were unconstitutional. The Constitution provides that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, providing two-thirds of the Senators present concur."

I also was opposed to it because it was an illegitimate child. Its daddies were the international manufacturers and bankers. In 1934 these "one-worlders" were out in the open and flooded Congress with their literature.

Here are a few of the original promoters of the reciprocal trade agreements: The Chase National Bank, the National City Bank of New York, General Motors, General Electric, Westinghouse, and scores of other corporations and individuals. All these were, and are, engaged in buying and selling foreign bonds and in selling American-manufactured products to foreign nations.

These wish the American people—especially the American farmer and laborer—to surrender their domestic market to these nations in order to service the foreign debt. In other words, so that these nations can buy their bonds and goods with the proceeds they get from the products they sell on our domestic market—products that can be, and should be, produced by our own people.

I have opposed this legislation and shall continue to. It is against the best interest of the laborer and the farmer. These two groups consist of the largest number of our people. I still believe that that is best which is for the best interest of the greatest number.

The original bill provided that the President could reduce the tariff 50 percent. Since then, it has been amended so that the President can lower the tariff 75 percent. Every agreement that has been entered into since the passage of this resolution has been favorable to the international manufacturer and banker and against the best interest of agriculture and labor.

It is true that the State Department will hold hearings on the proposed agreements, but they are a deception. The Department will listen to the opposition, but, invariably, their final decision will be the original agreement without a single change.

In the past chickens have come home to roost. They are again coming home. During 1936 and 1937 there were so many Canadian cattle shipped to the south St. Paul market that the farmers of North Dakota and surrounding States could not get their livestock marketed for even as low as 6 or 7 cents a pound. The market was absorbed and taken over by the Canadian producers.

Of course, the farmers protested, but it was too late. The agreements were in effect. Permit me to suggest to labor that in the campaign of 1936 most of the donkeys that many of my Democratic friends wore on the lapels of their coats were manufactured in Japan by labor that worked for 4 or 5 cents a day.

The California nut growers are now protesting against foreign nuts shipped into this country by the international profiteers. This while the people of the countries that produce them are hungry.

Soon the same will be true of citrus fruit. The citrus-fruit farmers of California and Florida and other States are already losing their farms by mortgage foreclosures because of the low price of their products. I am aware that fruit is still high enough in many parts of the Nation, but that is because of the high transportation charges. The producers of grapefruit a year ago in Florida got as low as 10 cents for a 60-pound crate.

Last fall the Department of Agriculture fixed a support price of $2 per hundred on domestic potatoes. Then under the reciprocal-trade agreements, the Canadians began shipping their potatoes into North Dakota, Maine, and other States, and sold them below the support price, with the result that the Canadian potatoes were consumed, and the American potatoes were piled up.

This forced the Secretary of Agriculture to lower his support price. Because of this performance—a support price on one hand and a reciprocal-trade agreement on the other—the American taxpayer, and the American housewife that purchased Canadian potatoes, will have to help pay millions of dollars in taxes to the producers of the American potatoes.

I will leave this warning with my friends. The time is here that we should use better judgment. I know that you are going to pass this resolution. I am confident when enough chickens have come home to roost, that then we will get rid of this international lunacy of destroying ourselves to enrich a few internationalist "one-worlders" for a profit under the pretense that we are doing something for other nations.

The time is not distant when we will reestablish the American system of protecting our own people—of continuing to have our American standard of living. This without tearing down any other nation, but by showing them how they too can have a higher standard of living if they will get rid of the internationalists—the parasites—that are always playing both ends against the middle.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired on the pending amendment.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 114, noes 154.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed as tellers Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania and Mr. DOUGHTON.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 119, noes 167.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the motion to recommit, and shall vote for the bill to extend the Reciprocal Trade Act on final passage. It is probable that conditions beyond my control may prevent my presence here in the Chamber at the time final vote occurs on the passage of the bill and I desire my position on this measure be clearly set forth.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CURTIS: Add a new section 7, as follows:

"SEC. 7. The President shall, as soon as practicable, but in any event not later than 90 days from the date of this act, institute such proceedings as are necessary to incorporate an escape clause to the same general effect as article XIX of the General Agreements on Tariffs and Trade in all trade agreements to which the United States is a party."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, at the present time we have trade agreements with some 33 or 34 countries. About half of those agreements, perhaps, maybe a little bit more, have what we call the escape clause. The escape clause is the procedure that has been adopted by the administration. I think it is a good thing. I have every reason to believe that the majority ought to accept this amendment. This amendment provides that the President shall institute such proceedings as are necessary to have the escape clause inserted in all agreements to which the United States is now a party.

May I first define what we mean by an escape clause? It is provided in article XIX that "concessions may be withdrawn or obligations suspended if in view of unforeseen developments they result in increased imports so substantial as to cause or threaten serious injury to home producers. There must, however, be consultation with the affected countries either before or immediately after withdrawing the concession with a view to reaching an agreement. If the agreement is not reached and the action is nevertheless taken, the parties affected by the action can then withdraw equivalent concessions."

I want to say at the outset we feel the adoption of this amendment alone will not necessarily bring relief to everyone adversely affected by trade agreements. It must be coupled with an honest, fair, and considerate administration and a desire to protect American workers and industries and our national defense. This law runs for but 3 years. Under it trade agreements will be entered into which will extend for many years. Therefore it is important that now we insert not only in all future trade agreements, but that we have inserted in the trade agreements already made an escape clause.

In presenting this amendment, I have no desire to plead the case of any industry or any group. It is prompted by the desire that we should extend equal treatment to all foreign countries. If the trade-agreement law is going to be an instrument to promote good will and friendly relations around the world, how can we say to one country, "You will have to have an escape clause in the agreement that we have with you"; and say to another country, "Your agreement will not have an escape clause." In the interest of equal treatment of all foreign nations, certainly the friends of this program should support this amendment.

The second reason why we should have this amendment is that it would extend equal treatment to all segments of our own domestic economy. Certain industries and certain groups of workers are affected by a trade agreement with a country where there is an escape clause. They have that protection and concessions can be withdrawn if it becomes wise and for the best interests of our country. Other industries and groups of workers do not have that protection. In the interest of equal treatment of all of our people and equal treatment of all foreign countries I urge you to adopt this amendment.

I hope that this bill is amended so that I can vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] has expired.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to prolong this discussion except to bring up again a point that has not been discussed during the present debate on the Trade Agreements Act, and which never has been discussed over the period of the last 16 or 18 years when we have had trade agreement legislation under consideration.

In the past we have dealt with industry agreements. In the future we are going to deal with national agreements. By that I mean that all of the benefits of the so-called most favored nation clause, within the provision of the Trade Agreements Act, will flow to every communized state in the world. When we stop to think that in these Communist-controlled states—10 of which are in eastern Europe behind the so-called iron curtain—all industries in those countries are thoroughly nationalized. We know they are under the complete domination and control of the Communist governments of those countries. We know that in each of those countries they have set up central export agencies for the purpose of controlling exports. We know that all those industries that are not paying industries—as we understand it in private enterprise—will be subsidized by the government. We know that those countries are desperately in need of the American dollar in order that they may carry on world trade. We know that in order to get that American dollar they must get the American market. It therefore becomes easy to understand, in order to flow their goods into the American market, whether it is shoes or any other type of products coming from these industries in the communized states, they are going to subsidize the production of those products in order to get under the American selling price of the American-made product.

Mr. Chairman, we know that the industries in Czechoslovakia in 1938 were able to undersell the shoe industry in our section of the country. They specialized in a particular type of shoe that was made in larger volume in our section of the country than in any other.

We know that that one industry, the largest of its kind in the world, manufactures over 50,000,000 pairs of rubber and leather shoes. That is the so-called Bata factory which has now been taken over by the Czech Government. We know that once the bars are let down and the American market is free for them they will deluge our markets with their products. They are going to destory the market on which the products of our own working men and women must depend. I believe we ought to have protection in this bill so that American industry and our workers can come here to the seat of government and make a plea in the interest of their own industry and their own communities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES] has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in not to exceed 20 minutes, the last 5 to be reserved in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in not to exceed 20 minutes, the last 5 to be reserved in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN] is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, when the reciprocal trade treaties were first discussed by the New Dealers in Congress, the top New Dealers everywhere back in 1934 contended that above all else it was the best insurance to keep America out of war and to keep the whole world at peace. But in spite of these claims we got right in the middle of World War II, the most terrible in history; so that claim has fallen flat. Also, it was claimed that it would be good for the economy of America. Facts and figures show that between the time the Reciprocal Trade Treaties Act passed in 1934 and the time we started producing for war we had on an average in America over 10,000,000 people unemployed. Then came the war, then the postwar era which we are now experiencing. Now, I challenge any Member on either side of this House to point out any 10-day period, or any 15-day period, or any 60-day period, or any period however short or long since the reciprocal-trade-treaty program of this administration went into effect that shows the agreements have been good for America or for the world. I am waiting for someone to rise in his place and challenge that statement. I see no one on their feet. So when you claim all these wonderful things for this reciprocal-trade-treaty program there is nothing to substantiate your claims whatsoever. At a meeting here in Washington, D. C., last spring which was called at the instance of Mr. Clayton himself, just a few days before we voted on this thing during the last session, I put the same challenge up to him as I have just done to any Member of this House and Mr. Clayton had to admit, with a red face before 25 Members of Congress, about half Republicans and half Democrats, that due to the fact that ever since the act was passed in 1934 we have experienced an abnormal economy in America.

Now Mr. Chairman, I have listened to a number of speeches yesterday and today on these so-called reciprocal trade treaties which of course are only reciprocal in favor of other nations.

The community market and stock market slump should be a warning to every one of us, that the New Deal honeymoon of the past and present is rapidly coming to an end, and that our give-away program must stop now to save the skins of the American farmer, labor, and industry and all Americans.

How can we expect to hold prices and wages up to a proper point when the party in power threatens to make it tough for everybody who has money to invest? One year ago today the price of corn with a 24-percent moisture content was selling at the midwestern farmer's crib for around $2 per bushel; today the same quality of corn is selling at the farmer's crib for around $1 per bushel. It is true that a lot of corn was sealed at around $1.40 per bushel, but the market is far below the Government support prices now, as are a number of basic farm crops, and still going down.

Now, what will the effect of this decline be on our national income and hence our ability to pay this extravagant administration budget request. If present prices for farm products are to be the average for the year 1949 the total gross farm income will be approximately $21,000,000,000 which will generate a gross national income of approximately $147,000,000,000, for the reason that the national income is always just about exactly seven times the farm income. That being a proven fact, I ask in all sincerity what will happen to the American taxpayers—who are to a great extent the ultimate consumers, for they pay the bill in the final analysis—and that includes the laborer, the farmer, the businessman, and all, when they are called upon by the local, county, State, and Federal Government to pay a total tax bill of between fifty-five and sixty billion dollars for 1948 out of a national income of $147,000,000,000 which they will be forced to pay if President Truman's request for funds is approved by this Congress.

Mr. Chairman, unless we maintain the annual farm income of our Nation at a level of around $30,000,000,000 until such time when the running expense of the Federal Government is drastically reduced, national bankruptcy will be our harvest for the whole New Deal give-away program. A full 90-percent support on basic storable farm crops for years to come is the best and only insurance against national bankruptcy, and all the misery that will come with it.

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Chairman, I arise to call the attention of the House to the fact that under the trade programs of this administration, the filbert-nut industry of the Pacific Northwest is virtually bankrupted, and the important bottom-fisheries industry in my part of the country is almost entirely closed down.

Filbert imports, which have been coming into this country since the war, have exceeded 400 percent of prewar and placed our growers in a position where they will have to completely go out of business unless these imports are restricted. While these increased importations have been coming into our country, the costs of production have arisen just about the same percentage.

We do not ask that these foreign imports be completely cut off, but we do feel it only fair to ask that they be restricted to the same rate as before the war. If such a step is not undertaken by this Government, we will see the complete ruination of one of our important, stable Northwest industries—and such ruination will not be long in coming.

Our fishing fleets, which have produced for our American markets large quantities of bottom fish, are unable to compete with the extremely heavy imports from Newfoundland, Iceland, and Great Britain. This business was a very profitable one for our fisherman a few years ago, but they have suffered so greatly from these imports that the bottom-fisheries fleet stands idle in our ports most of the time. These men have investments in their equipment which is sizable and can be compared exactly to the investment a businessman makes in his store. Unless they are given some reasonable protection, they stand to lose a substantial part of their investments. I know many of these men and have seen them acquire their boats and gear over a period of years through good, honest labor and hard work, and it is lamentable to see them sitting idle most of the time. I ask that this Government take steps to see that these people are given fair and reasonable treatment—they do not ask for more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCGREGOR].

Mr. MCGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, the subject before us today known as the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1949—H. R. 1211—vitally affects all Americans, the farmer, the workingman, and the consumer. It may well determine whether we go forward to a high standard of living with higher standards of wages, or whether we blunder into another depression or recession with vast unemployment. My candid opinion, Mr. Speaker, is that American-trade policies are too vital to the Nation's welfare to trust to the whims of one man, however well intentioned that one man may be. H. R. 1211, as it is now written, would give to the President of the United States the right to lower or raise tariff rates as he sees fit. In my opinion, the present bill will legislate, regulate, and finance the abolishment of hundreds of thousands of American workers' jobs. This legislation will allow products to be brought into this country from foreign nations where the living standards are much lower than ours in this country. Our farmers will also be forced to compete with the prices of farm products of foreign nations, which certainly are at a lower level because of the foreign wage element involved. I firmly believe that this act should be amended so that the peril point will be protected. The peril point is nothing more than a report made by the Tariff Commission specifying the point below which it would be perilous to this country to go in reducing tariff. Certainly no thinking and patriotic American should object to the inclusion of an amendment which is essential to the preservation of our Nation's economy and our Nation's security; and certainly the President should be willing to allow the Tariff Commission to submit this full report to him for his guidance. If this provision is not included in the law, may I call to your attention, that there is no other fact-finding agency of the Government with such vast experience, operating strictly on a bipartisan basis, as the Tariff Commission, which can give this information to the President. Surely this amendment would not hamper restrictions and it would most assuredly let the President know whether or not the importation of certain articles would definitely hinder our living standards.

I also urge that an amendment be included in H. R. 1211 to provide an escape clause. The reason for this is that at the present time many industries whose tariff protection has been seriously reduced are unfairly discriminated against, because they are denied the privilege which other industries have of appealing under the escape clause. I contend that all industries should have equal treatment and a chance to have their day in court.

If these two amendments are not incorporated in this bill, certainly the working people and all those who have a stake in the continued prosperity of our Nation should hold the Democratic Party strictly accountable for the economic evils and disastrous consequences which will beset our national economy, which would be the result of any ill-advised tariff reduction. When the time arrives when factories are closed and many millions are out of work, those directly affected should remember who is to blame.

May I reiterate my former statements, Mr. Chairman; when you reduce the tariff on products from other countries you are allowing products to be brought into this country made by low-income labor, which makes it impossible for the American worker to match. We all believe in reciprocal trade, Mr. Chairman, but let us make sure it is reciprocal, taking into consideration the welfare and living standard of our own people.

I hope the amendments I have referred to will be accepted so that we can show to our workers, our farmers, and all of our people, that we are sincerely trying to protect their interests.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGREGOR. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS. I have received a letter this morning from a small community in my district, a district of about 5,000 people, stating that 1,500 are out of work today.

Mr. McGREGOR. That is a concrete example of what is taking place and what is going to take place.

May I assure you, and I think the people of America will assure you, that the blame is entirely on your shoulders when you pass this type of legislation.

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGREGOR. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. SADLAK. There are at the present time some 45,000 unemployed in the State of Connecticut and the lay-offs are increasing each day.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGREGOR. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusets.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. May I say that in Massachusetts last year, according to the statistics I have received from the Social Security office, 240,000 workers receive a total sum in unemployment compensation of $50,000,000 and the condition is getting steadily worse.

Mr. McGREGOR. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. I read into the hearings a letter to me dated February 1 from Lieutenant General Lutes, Director of the staff of the Munitions Board, to establish once and for all that these skilled workmen from the watchmaking industry are extremely important in our national defense as a source of skilled workmen for the making of small gears, pinions, and other control parts for the guided-missile program and for the making of compasses, time fuzes, watches, clocks, tachometers, navigational instruments, aircraft instruments, and time-delay devices. Instead of drawing comparisons between 1949 and 1940, Mr. Forrestal should take steps to build up our national defense in these skills to a point far beyond our present inadequate condition. An inadequate tariff, the denial of authentic and timely information provided by the Simpson amendment, or a trade-agreement program that provides no escape clause have all forced our own national defense to take second place to trade expansion.

Testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means revealed that it will require from 2 to 10 years to train men of these various skills. It is generally conceded that we will not have that time available for training these workers in event of another war.

Proponents of the bill now before us state that any industry adversely affested by reciprocal trade agreements can appeal to the Committee on Reciprocity Information for relief, but in this very watchmaking industry our trade agreements provide no escape clause and there is no disposition shown as yet by any responsible Government official to renegotiate those trade agreements and to place in them the escape clause so badly needed by our watchmaking industry.

Until the majority side of the House brings out better proof of their interest in national defense and gives us an escape clause in the Swiss trade agreement, I will condemn them for placing national defense in second place to trade expansion. As for me, I cannot approve such action, and unless this amendment is adopted, I will have to oppose this present legislation. I cannot see the reason or sense in denying our national defense that safeguard. I have listened carefully throughout all the proceedings of the Committee on Ways and Means, but I have not heard any argument that justifies keeping the Swiss agreement in effect without an escape clause.

Does the gentleman have the answer?

Mr. LYNCH. I think I have. I am reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 8, 1949, page 936, and the authority is none other than Secretary Forrestal whom I imagine the gentleman will concede knows something about national defense. He said:

> The domestic jewel watch industry has fulfilled its role in our program of national defense, and I am not aware that its capabilities have been adversely affected by the reciprocal trade authority.

I think that answers the question.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Forrestal does not tell you that we had an inadequate stock pile or pool of skilled workmen in 1940, and he does not tell you that we have an inadequate number of them today as is clearly the case. Let him get down to the fundamentals of this legislation and tell us why he does not stand up for a more adequate preparedness program. Positive action is needed. It is not sufficient preparedness merely to preserve an inadequate pool of skilled workers. The Simpson and Curtis amendments would safeguard our defense and at the same time they would help to build a sound reciprocal trade program. Without these safeguards our national defense is weakened and threatened and Mr. Forrestal's statement is merely a statement of his own unawareness of our peril in this phase of our preparedness.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am extremely glad the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] spoke as he did. Only 4 or 5 days ago I telephoned one of the Departments of National Defense and asked them how they felt about having the watch companies of the United States closed down and the workers of this country go to other countries, so that we would lose their skill. I remember his horrified answer at the thought of our skilled precision workers going to other countries when the need for a strong national defense is vital. The gentleman from Iowa has spoken truly. I for one will not vote for the trade-agreements program unless there is an escape clause in this bill. We in Massachusetts, in fact in all of New England, for I can speak for New England, too, realize just what we are facing today. I remember what the cotton industry faced at the time of the Japanese competition. People in the State Department were saying to me, "Oh, my dear Mrs. ROGERS, how can you hurt the feelings of the dear Japanese?" The dear Japanese stabbed us in the back and one of those very officials was calling for help from the United States from Corregidor before help came.

I think we are going through somewhat the same situation today. Some of you older Members remember the fight I and others made against the importation of Czechoslovakian shoes, against the construction of the shoe factory at Belcamp, Md., by the foreign Bata Shoe Co., where they were buying into slavery the children of our own United States, the families not realizing what they were doing. The administration was against me in that fight in the beginning. I want to tell the Members of the House, and I have the records of it, as the Department of Justice turned over findings regarding the illegal entry of the Czechoslovakians into this country under the pretense of being instructors, men who were operating under Nazi-dominated Germany.

I know in Massachusetts the recession that is taking place today, that is already taking place in the wool industry, the cotton textile industry, and the Waltham Watch and many other companies. Do you want to have a very large number of workers in the United States on unemployment relief? Do you not think they would prefer good wages and comforts instead of practically a dole or unemployment relief? How can the country stand paying all the unemployment relief the United States will have to pay if the recession in industry goes on?

The General Electric in Massachusetts, I am told reliably by workers and others, is curtailing its work in Massachusetts. Industry is receding in employment all over the country. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that if you do not vote protection in this bill you are putting nails in the coffin of our prosperity and the happiness of our workers and the welfare of our country. It would be a national calamity not to have skilled workers in our industries necessary for national defense. Soon after World War I, I introduced the first bill in Congress, and finally years later the bill was enacted providing for the War Department to educate American industry in the production of military items. We cannot permit foreign nations to control our industries or take them from us.

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time primarily because the subject under discussion is of vital concern to the 2,300 watch workers and their families, of Waltham, Mass., whom I have the honor to represent in this body.

However, it is my conviction that it also should be of paramount interest to every Member of the Congress because, by authoritative admission, it involves the question of adequate national defense.

In substantiation of this point, I am going to quote to you the exact words of Rear Adm. F. C. Denebrink, United States Navy, Director of Procurement, Manpower and Utilities, acting in behalf of the United States Munitions Board. These remarks are contained in a letter Admiral Denebrink recently sent to Mr. Harley Hise, Chairman, Board of Directors, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in answer to an inquiry from Mr. Hise. The admiral stated, and I quote:

The Waltham, Hamilton, and Elgin Watch Cos. were employed to 100 percent of their capacity in Government work from December 1941 to August 1945. During this period they manufactured jewel bearings, chronometers, fire-control watches, time fuses, aircraft instruments and other essential products. Most of these items could not then nor could they now be produced by other domestic watch companies.

It is considered that the maintenance of at least a minimum level of operation by the Waltham, Hamilton and Elgin Watch Cos. is vital to the defense of the United States and should be preserved.

At this moment 2,300 workers, in an American community, a large portion of them veterans, are out of work. The substantial reason for this catastrophe is that these skilled precision-instrument workers were 100 percent engaged in war production and, while they were at war against the enemy, the watch manufacturing business of this country went to Switzerland.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit, here and now, for conscientious deliberation by each Member of this House, this question—is it your intention that an American industry shall be penalized to the point of extinguishment because of its whole-scale participation in the recent war effort?

I well recognize that the time period is limited this afternoon and it is not my intention to overburden you with extended recitation of comparative figures and tables of computation already of record.

In this respect I would like to refer you to the speech I made on this matter, on the floor of the House, last June 21, 1948, and the report of the recent hearings held before the Committee on Ways and Means on the dates of January 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31, and February 1, all 1949.

A study of the testimony at these hearings reveals a graphic picture of the developments leading to the gradual strangulation of a vital American industry through no fault of its own.

Here is an American industry, employing American labor, paying American wages, trying to sell American products to the American people—and they are being deprived of an equal opportunity in their own American market.

Now, yesterday I listened carefully to the well-meaning words of my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COMBS], for whom I have the greatest admiration. In substance, he attributed the present financial difficulties of the Waltham Watch Co. as entirely due to bad management, and went on to state that the two other American watch-manufacturing companies, Elgin and Hamilton, just completed the best year in their history, selling more watches, making as much or more profit than ever before. Let us see if this is so. On page 491 of the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means on H. R. 1211, we find the testimony, on this point, of James G. Shennan, president, Elgin Watch Co. Chairman DOUGHTON asked Mr. Shennan this question, "How are your profits now, compared with profits before the war?" This is Mr. Shennan's answer, and I quote:

The dollar profits are lower now than they were before the war. In 1940–41, for example, Elgin had net earnings, after taxes, of $1,540,000, and in 1947 we had $1,387,000. The figures for 1948 are not yet available but would not be substantially different. The percentage of net earnings to sales in 1940 was 12.4; in 1941 it was 9.4; and in 1947 it was 6.3. It has been said that 1946 was the year in which Elgin had the greatest earnings in its history. That was said at this hearing, and that is not true, sir. We made $1,130,000 in 1946 and earned 6½ percent of the net earnings through sales. Personally, I think that is too low to be healthy.

I submit that this testimony of Mr. Shennan clearly reveals that Elgin—and Hamilton is in a similar position—has so far managed to struggle against the financial strain imposed by Swiss importations, but is existing on a marginal line of security so vulnerable that a slight decrease in sales would plunge both Elgin and Hamilton into serious difficulty. If Waltham should go out of business, Elgin or Hamilton will inevitably be next, depending upon which one of them gets into trouble first.

The facts show that the jeweled-watch industry of the United States has done everything possible to meet the difference in cost of manufacturing watch movements here and abroad, and is not trying to hide behind a tariff wall. They wish no stifling of competition, they seek no monopoly in business, they ask only to be accorded the fair treatment they patriotically deserve.

The 1936 trade agreement with Switzerland reduced the tariffs on watches, and thereafter the American industry's share in the American market fell sharply. Subsequent to the 1936 trade agreement, four factors, in addition to the reduction of tariffs, operated to reduce further the tariff protection which remained to the industry.

First. In 1934, the United States reduced the value of the dollar. This is one of the reasons given in the Tariff Commission's digest of trade data on the trade agreement with Switzerland, for reducing watch tariffs by the Swiss trade agreement in 1936. Four months after consummation of the agreement, the Swiss devalued the franc by approximately 35 percent, but no compensating increase was thereafter made in the reduced tariffs.

Second. The tariff duties on watches are specific, that is to say, so many dollars and cents per watch. The subsequent inflation has operated to reduce further, on an ad valorem or percentage basis, the protection left by the trade agreement and the devaluation of the Swiss franc.

Third. The duty on adjustments, which was intended to afford progressively greater protection the higher the quality of the watch, has been rendered completely ineffective by the marking of imported watches as unadjusted, regardless of the fact.

Fourth. The cost of watch-movement manufacture, which is practically, all labor, has more than doubled in this country since the beginning of the war.

The dollar increase here has been disproportionate to that in Switzerland, inasmuch as we started from a higher base cost because of the much higher labor rates in this country. Our labor rates are approximately 2½ times those of the Swiss for comparable jobs.

Over 55,000,000 jeweled watches and movements have been imported into this country since 1941; the high point being 1946 when imports of jeweled watches exceeded the 9,000,000 mark.

During the first 11 months of 1948, the latest statistics available to us, the imports of jeweled watches exceeded 7,100,000. This is an average of almost 7,000,000 jeweled watches annually over the years beginning with 1941, as contrasted to an average of about 2,600,000 from 1936 through 1940, and an average of less than 1,000,000 for the years 1930 through 1935.

All of these watches are advertised and sold as jeweled watches and are competitive with the products of this industry.

The trade agreement with Switzerland has been in effect almost 12 years and has never been changed during that entire period; that agreement does not contain an escape clause as the more recently renegotiated agreements do.

There was a negotiation between our State Department and the Swiss Government in 1946 by which the Swiss agreed to voluntarily restrict their exports to the United States, but the figure of 7,700,000 movements arrived at was practically the same as they were exporting at that time.

Now, throughout these years, the jeweled-watch industry has been unable to obtain satisfactory cooperation of the State Department even after repeated efforts and presentation of their case.

It is my information that Switzerland has not, as yet, become a party to the general agreement on tariffs and trade and will not be a party to the coming negotiations at Geneva in April.

Therefore, it appears clear there is no hope of relief to this industry without direct action of the Congress.

At the recent hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means a suggestion was made that a special subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means be appointed to study this whole problem and I wish to emphasize today my endorsement of that suggestion.

I consider it the patriotic duty of this Congress to exert every means at our disposal to afford the jeweled-watch industry of the United States an equality of opportunity in the domestic market.

I am not speaking in opposition to the bill which is before the House, nor am I personally opposed to the cooperative economic theory at the basis of the trade-agreements program, as a whole.

I am, however, of the heartfelt conviction that, in the midst of our charitable generosity throughout the world, it is obligatory upon this body to be particularly concerned with the community problems of our own people here in the United States. When the problem involves the preservation of irreplaceable skilled craftsmanship and an essential contribution to our national defense needs, then I say it is mandatory that we take appropriate action now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL].

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and say to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts that I think there is a great deal of misunderstanding concerning the effect of this amendment.

Since 1942 the policy of our Government with reference to trade agreements has been to include the escape clause in all trade agreements.

In 1947 the President of the United States by Executive order set forth the rule which in substance directs that every trade agreement contain an escape clause.

Actually, the pending amendment is a most serious one. It is more dangerous than the peril-point amendment which this body has just voted down, for the reason that this amendment by law makes it mandatory upon the President of the United States to renegotiate existing trade agreements with a number of countries.

Not long ago at Geneva we entered into multilateral trade agreements with 22 other countries. In each of those agreements was included the so-called escape clause. Within the next few months this Government and a number of other countries are going to hold a conference at Annecy, France, for the purpose of negotiating and executing multilateral trade agreements in which also will be included the escape clause. The countries attending the conference at Annecy will be Colombia, Salvador, Haiti, Nicaragua, Sweden, Peru, and Uruguay. I mention the Annecy conference to you for the purpose of showing that with time, patience, and understanding the policy of this Government is dedicated to the inclusion of the escape clause in all existing trade agreements.

It is clear to everyone familiar with the history of the trade-agrements legislation that in 1934 Congress delegated to the executive branch of the Government the power to negotiate and enter into trade agreements with foreign countries. We have given the President wide latitude in this respect. As I have indicated before, the President, both in deed and in fact, since 1942 has set up a system of procedure which is designed to safeguard and protect American industry in the event of threat or injury to our economy. The present amendment, however, if it becomes law, makes it mandatory upon the President of the United States to renegotiate existing trade agreements with a number of countries. This mandate of the Congress would not only restrict the power of the President but it would place our negotiators at a definite disadvantage with a number of these countries with whom we now have trade agreements. There are a number of countries, for example, who will probably not attend the conference at Annecy, France. We have trade agreements with these countries which do not include the escape clause, although I am informed that every effort is being made and will continue to be made to have these countries accept the terms of the escape clause proviso. It would be well at this point to insert the names of these countries into the RECORD. They are: Argentina, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Guatemala, Honduras, Iceland, Iran, Switzerland, Turkey, and Venezuela. Suppose these countries refused to renegotiate? Suppose they refused to insert the escape clause? Would the mandatory provisions of this amendment force us to break off trade relations? Clearly, this is too serious a question to be disposed of in such a short time.

But there is another reason why we should not pass this amendment. It is not wise—it is not sound to place restrictions upon the President to whom we have delegated the power to negotiate trade agreements. This amendment unquestionably would tie his hands in many ways. In dealing with able negotiators such as the Swiss and those of Argentina by the approval of this amendment we would set the standards against your own traders and negotiators—not against the opposition. You place the executive branch of government in an unfavorable bargaining position. Such a practice would not only be unsound but would be detrimental to our foreign economic policy.

Yesterday during debate I stated that I hoped that the Swiss, in good faith, would agree to include the escape clause proviso in their trade agreement with us, but may I say to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts that that in itself would not solve the problem confronting the American watch industry. Such an escape-clause provision merely provides that one of three methods may be used to determine whether or not an American industry has been damaged as the result of a trade agreement. Under the escape-clause proviso, an industry such as the Waltham watch industry may call upon the Tariff Commission to make an investigation to determine whether the industry has been endangered by a trade agreement, second, the Tariff Commission itself could initiate such an investigation; or, third, the President could call upon the Tariff Commission for such a report in the event he so desired.

Again I repeat—in addition to the unfavorable position in which we would place our negotiators, we must also consider whether an amendment such as this may vitiate or abrogate certain existing trade agreements.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARROLL. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. This amendment does not carry any penalties; does not withdraw any power from the President. It does not abrogate the existing trade agreements. It merely puts the Congress on record as asking the President to try to do it.

Mr. CARROLL. I say that this is a legislative mandate requiring the President to take positive action, and, if this amendment passes, you will be placing at a disadvantage and handcuffing the negotiators to whom the Congress has heretofore delegated its authority. I ask that the amendment be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CURTIS) there were—ayes 119, noes 154.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. DOUGHTON and Mr. CURTIS to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 116, noes 159.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAND: Add a new section, to be known as section 1, as follows:

"SEC. 7. No such foreign trade agreement shall become effective until such agreement shall have been filed during a session of Congress for a period of 60 days with the Clerk of the House of Representatives and with the Secretary of the Senate. If during such period of 60 days, the Congress shall, by joint resolution, disapprove the agreement, it shall for all purposes be void."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAND. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in not to exceed 7 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAND. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is a very simple one, and I doubt that I will require 5 minutes to speak briefly on it. In my opinion it does not interfere in any way with the powers asked for by the administration in connection with these reciprocal trade agreements. It does not put the Congress back into the business of writing detailed tariff legislation, which I would oppose. The power which is retained by the Congress under this amendment would be used but seldom, and only in the event of a real emergency. If an agreement were negotiated which was considered to be extremely detrimental to some segment of our economy or industry, or to the national welfare, the Congress under this amendment would have the retained power to interfere with the execution of that agreement.

I have always felt very strongly about this matter. It is my position that the Congress must not and should not abdicate its constitutional and historical prerogative to exercise ultimate control over tariff questions. It seems to me that those who believe in reciprocal trade in theory, and in this legislation, but who also believe in retaining in the Congress its constitutional and historical power which it has had in the past and which it should retain in the future can vote for this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the committee give this serious consideration, because now that we have rejected the other two amendments, it seems to me this is the last chance to safeguard, in this reasonable fashion, the national economy.

Danger points are even now evident. The time will come when the industries of my district, particularly glass manufacture and fishing, will require some protection from foreign imports. Other industries throughout the country someday will suffer. Labor will suffer. When the day of reckoning comes I can say that I tried to help.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAND].

Mr. Chairman, the very purpose of the reciprocal-trade-agreements program is to avoid the very thing this amendment would create. Certainly we know historically that there is very little chance to secure congressional approval of agreements of this kind. Although quite a number have been submitted throughout the years of the past only three were approved. So the adoption of this amendment would be about the most effective way to kill the program as a whole.

Mr. HAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HAND. This does not require congressional approval. It requires the Congress to disapprove. The gentleman's party is in control of that situation.

Mr. COOPER. For all practical purposes it amounts to the same thing and the same result would follow.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAND].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we will shortly be called upon to vote for a continuation of the so-called reciprocal trade agreements. In the past I have voted against this legislation because, in my opinion, it was not reciprocity in the true meaning of the word, and because I felt that if this program was continued that it would eventually produce unemployment for my friends in the Eleventh Ohio District who work in the glass factories, the potteries, and perhaps in the paper factories, to say nothing of the further hardships which this unemployment would bring to industrial owners and all others dependent upon a constant and equitable pay roll.

It is difficult to understand how we are going to compete with foreign workers who are receiving 7 cents in wages for making an identical glass tumbler for which our American workers are receiving 60 cents in wages. It is also hard to explain how the workers in the shoe factories in my congressional district can compete with a foreign-made shoe which comes into America duty-free just because the heel has not been tacked on. This puts the shoe in the class of unfinished products which are permitted to enter free. It requires just a minute to tack on the ready-made heel and the shoe is then put on the American market to retail at a price which is less than it costs to manufacture the same shoe in the United States.

In the past when this legislation was before us the local unions, as well as the employers, have contacted me requesting that I oppose this extension. Now, I notice, though not contacted, that both the A. F. of L. and the CIO leadership are asking that the present bill be passed. Furthermore, not one manufacturer of shoes, glassware, clay products, paper, or any other product in my district has contacted me, either for or against this proposed legislation.

Therefore, it appears that only one course is open to me. If labor wants it and management does not oppose it, then who am I to set myself up as being superior in judgment to those who should be most affected by the act? This does not mean that I have abdicated principle in favor of expediency, but it does cause me to wonder if I have been correct in my previous deductions.

Personally, I think that if the escape-clause amendment which will be offered is adopted, it will materially strengthen the bill. But regardless of whether it is approved or rejected, I am fearful that a program as outlined in this proposed legislation will, if not properly administered, produce idle factories and men walking the streets looking for work, just as it has resulted in closing the Waltham Watch Co. If that time should come—and I pray that it does not—then I just want the men and women who work in the above-named industries in our congressional district to know that their labor leaders endorsed the program and asked for its passage.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAILEY: On page 3, after line 8, amend by adding a new section to be designated as a new section:

"SEC. 7. No reduction in duty under the Tariff Act of 1930 rates shall be made on imports competing directly with articles produced by handicraft industries in the United States. Handicraft industries are defined as those in which the salaries and wages or direct and indirect labor constitute 50 percent or more of the costs of production and include only those groups of manufacturers, excluding contractors, producing by recognized handicraft methods, like or similar products, from which the Bureau of the Census can obtain and publish industrial statistics. The Tariff Commission shall make the final determination of these qualifications."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that amendment until I have examined it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because I realize that the Seventy-first Congress in 1930, which drafted and passed the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, must have considered this handicraft industry of china and glassware as being a rather delicate industry and needing a high degree of protection.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close 2 minutes after the gentleman from West Virginia finishes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. Again, let me say that they must have considered this handicraft industry as being in need of a large degree of protection, because they provided a 60 percent ad valorem import duty. I make the point that the reciprocal-trade agreement of 1934 and all subsequent agreements were wrong in that they lowered that rate of duty down to an ad valorem duty of approximately 30 percent. If H. R. 1211 is passed, it will be possible at the coming Geneva negotiations to reduce the major part of those rates from 30 percent ad valorem to as low as 15 percent ad valorem on certain grades of this material.

I would like to make the point that no relief was secured by these people when they called on the State Department or the other people who held hearings in preparation for the Geneva conference. I got no results in my plea before the Committee on Ways and Means. My only thought was that the House might accord relief when we could not get relief from any other source.

I would like to point out, if you please, that back when the first reciprocal-trade agreement went into effect, the importation of hand-made glass from Czechoslovakia alone for the year 1938, under the reciprocal-trade treaty, equaled 23 percent of the total domestic production of that kind of ware in this country. Only the war saved us, and, now that we are out of the war period, within 1 year the importations of that glass will exceed what they were in the prewar period. We were getting along all right during the war period, but now, because of the impact of the postwar period, these industries must have some protection. We must realize that they do not involve enough of our economy to ruin the reciprocal-trade-agreement program.

Let me quote a few figures. The chinaware industry domestic production of this grade of hand ware amounted to $9,800,000 and the imports amounted to $1,245,000. In the case of glassware, the total production of hand-made was $42,000,000 and imports were $4,506,000.

You can afford to exclude these two handicraft industries without hurting any of your over-all program.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The gentleman from West Virginia quoted imports from private industry from Czechoslovakia before the war. Now what he is quoting is imports from nationalized, Government-owned, Government-controlled industries in Czechoslovakia that will be subsidized, if necessary, to get under the market price of the products manufactured in the gentleman's State.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the gentleman for the information.

I should like to say that right now the trouble with this industry is brought about by the activity of the Army in Germany and Japan, particularly in Germany, in rehabilitating and rebuilding these plants. They have even brought displaced persons from Czechoslovakia, skilled pottery workers, and they have them today working in the pottery plants in Germany. We cannot stand that kind of competition.

I trust the good will and the good judgment of the House to exclude the products of these handicraft industries.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane. It imposes duties and requirements upon the Bureau of the Census which are certainly not within the scope of the pending bill or the original act which is sought to be amended by the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from West Virginia desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BAILEY. Not if the Chair intends to support the gentleman from Tennessee; it would be a waste of effort.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the Chair will not prejudge this matter, but if the gentleman has no more confidence in the amendment than he has indicated, the Chair will rule that the point of order is sustained.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAILEY: Page 3, after line 8, insert the following:

"SEC. 7. During any calendar year after 1948 the total amount of imported wood wire spring clothespins, or the total amount of any article of china, hand-made glassware or tableware, which may be entered or withdrawn from warehouse in the United States for consumption, shall not exceed 25 percent of the production within the United States during the preceding calendar year of clothespins, or of such article of china, hand-made glassware or tableware, as the case may be."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against this amendment. It is certainly not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from West Virginia desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

I based this amendment on the supposition that there were some sound basic reasons why the Congress in the past imposed an import quota on the shipment of Cuban sugar into the United States for the benefit of sugar producers in the State of Louisiana. I assume that the reason for doing that was predicated on the assumption that there was too much competition coming from Cuba and the other sugar-producing countries and that those producers in the State of Louisiana needed protection. I insist there is too much competition against the handcraft glass and pottery industries and that they need similar consideration from this Congress. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia might have been germane to another statute, but it certainly is not germane to the bill under consideration.

The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a third amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAILEY: Page 3, after line 8, insert the following:

"SEC. 7. No foreign-trade agreement concluded after the enactment of this act pursuant to section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, shall apply with respect to articles produced or manufactured by an American-owned factory in any foreign country. For the purposes of this section, the term 'American owned factory' means any factory (1) which is owned by citizens or residents of the United States, by a corporation or partnership created or organized in the United States or under the law of the United States or of any State or Territory, or by a foreign corporation the majority of the voting stock of which is owned by any of the foregoing, and (2) in the case of which such ownership was acquired after 1930."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment close in not to exceed 7 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment should most certainly interest the gentleman on the left of the center aisle.

If this amendment is not adopted, you stand to destroy a vaunted and boasted American economy by reducing it to the level of a world economy. Instead of keeping before us the idea that we should bring these people up to our level, the continuation of these reciprocal-trade agreements with the tendency of American capital to move their industries abroad as in the case of the Underwood Typewriter people going to Italy, Remington Rand going to Scotland, and the textile people going to Mexico, Colombia, Italy, and Haiti, and I could enumerate at least a dozen other instances.

If that is kept up, it is plain what is going to happen. It is obvious that they are going there for the purpose of exploiting cheap labor and cheaper working conditions than the standards we have here in America. It is time to break up that practice. If they were there before 1930, it would be perfectly all right to consider that they were legitimate. If they built a factory in another country since the first Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of 1934, they should not take advantage of the reductions in reciprocal-trade rates for the simple reason that it is premeditated. If you do not call their hand now, you can figure that in future years we will cease to have an American economy and it is going to be a world economy because we are going to drag down our cost of living to the level of the cost of living of these people abroad. I do not think there is any danger in it. I think it is a matter of good judgment and common sense that the amendment be approved. It is time that we stopped the migration of American capital and industries abroad so that they can manufacture on a cheaper basis and import those products, just as the gentleman, who testified before the Labor Committee only this past week, said a textile company was producing in Haiti. The shirts were manufactured with the collar and cuffs left off so that they could get by our customs, and then they put the collars and cuffs on after they came into this country.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wonder if the gentleman's amendment would help protect American enterprise located in other countries, which are financed under this new proposal whereby the Government is to guarantee investments in other countries.

Mr. BAILEY. It would help your watch industry that has gone to Switzerland since 1930. It would help your fishing industry which you were complaining about. That is why I said you people on that side should be interested in this amendment.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Does not the gentleman think we should maintain a tariff in order to protect American labor and American enterprise so that that glass factory in your district would be able to operate?

Mr. BAILEY. My presence on the floor answers that.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Why don't you come over here and sit down with me? I agree with everything you say.

Mr. BAILEY. Then you will probably vote with me.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I will.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PERKINS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, the President has again asked Congress for a 3-year renewal of the Trade Agreements Act of 1934. Under the Trade Agreements Act, as it existed up to 1948, the President, by an act of Congress, was given authority to adjust downward tariffs in consideration that other countries make the same reciprocal concessions for the purpose of expanding our foreign trade and bettering our foreign relations.

This act which is now before Congress prescribes limits of authority beyond which the President cannot go. It provides safeguards for our domestic industries inasmuch as there is a careful study made by the interdepartmental branches of our Government before any concessions are made, and every trade agreement is executed with the provision that the United States reserves the right to withdraw or modify any concessions which threaten serious damage to any domestic industry.

The membership of this body are not so young but what they remember conditions in this country prior to the enactment of the Trade Agreements Act of 1934. Most of the countries of the world had barriers against our commodities. We recall the enactment of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act and other high tariff legislation which brought about an ill feeling between nations in the economic field.

From our past experience, it is apparent that a sound world-trade program is an indispensable factor in international economic cooperation. We must not forget that we are living today in a sick world—a sick Europe—other nations looking to these United States for leadership.

In the circumstances we cannot afford to be persuaded by minority interest or be deceived by the false doctrines of economic nationalism into following the same path that we pursued after World War I.

This law that is before Congress today for enactment worked splendidly for 14 years. It is obvious that the 3-year extension is necessary in order that our Government may negotiate sizable trades with other nations.

An extension for 1 year, as was enacted last year, would imply to the other nations that we are not interested in a long-range trade program, and a betterment of living standards abroad. Such a limitation will frighten other countries and cause them to look with disfavor upon our product. We cannot go forward and be isolationists.

H. R. 1211 eliminates another objectionable feature that was enacted by the Eightieth Congress. In that bill the functions of the Tariff Commission were limited to report its findings on minimum tariffs and other import restrictions or the increases in tariffs, necessary to avoid the mere threat of injury to domestic industry, protecting any article up for consideration for trade-agreements concessions by the United States.

The guiding star in the 1948 law was the mere threat to that particular domestic industry, and not the welfare of this Nation or any other nation. Such findings were made without regard to any national or international consideration.

These crippling amendments were put in the bill to serve temporarily a few selfish interests without any consideration for the welfare of this Nation, or any benefit to be obtained by other countries. They were put in the bill for the purpose of carrying out the old theory, that only the prosperity of the industry is affected by the tariff, and make that the sole base in deciding what concessions the United States may make in trade agreements.

H. R. 1211, if enacted as drafted, will put into operation an effective world trade program that will go a long way in curing the economic ills of other nations.

We all know that the recovery of other nations is not dependent alone upon the enactment of the reciprocal-trade-agreements bill as written, but we do realize that this legislation will serve as an effective stimulant to bring about international cooperation and good will among the various nations. We know from experience that a high level of world trade means a high living standard at home, and insures the same living standard abroad.

H. R. 1211 should be enacted as reported to this House by the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia would have a tendency to destroy the reciprocal-trade-agreement program, and I ask that it be voted down without any further debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BAILEY) there were—ayes 74, noes 144.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAYS of Ohio: On page 3, after line 8, amend by adding a new section to be known as section 7:

"SEC. 7. No foreign trade agreement shall be concluded after the enactment of this act pursuant to section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, with any country wholly or partly in Europe which is not a participating country (as defined in sec. 103 (a) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948). Any foreign trade agreement concluded with any such country prior to the enactment of this act shall be terminated, in accordance with the agreement, as soon as practicable."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in not to exceed 7 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment not to destroy the Reciprocal Trade Act or to hamper it in any way. However, there has been a great deal said in the brief period I have been in this House about the Economic Cooperation Administration, and the job that it is trying to do.

I am simply asking in this amendment that we dry up the source of dollars for the countries in Europe that are trying to destroy this Economic Cooperation Administration. That source of dollars is the means that they use to disseminate their propaganda in the friendly nations which we are trying to reconstitute in the pattern of American democracy.

I had the privilege of being in Italy a few days after the Italian elections this spring; and I want to say to you that the Communists in Italy were well supplied with funds with which to propagandize the Italian people. All of their bills and accounts were paid in dollars. Where did those dollars come from? They came from countries which have industries which are nationalized and which sell products in this country and take those dollars and turn them over to the nationalized government to be used to undermine the program of this country not only in Europe but, if you please, even right in the United States to undermine our very Government.

This House today on the recommendation of the House Administration Committee of which I am a member granted $200,000 to the Committee on Un-American Activities; yet one little industry in a nationalized gangster-dominated country in Europe took out three times that much money in dollars last year under a reciprocal-trade agreement. I refer to Czechoslovakia. Let me say at this point that there are many people in my district of Czech nationality groups; they are fine people. I think I can say with authority that the Government of Czechoslovakia today, which is not the Government that negotiated the treaty, does not represent more than 2 or 3 percent of the people; it is a gangster government imposed on that country from without by threat of invasion and force. I think anyone on either side of the center aisle can conscientiously go along with this amendment. The adoption of this amendment will not harm the theory of reciprocity; nor will it tie the hands of our negotiators in the coming agreements. It will simply prevent American dollars from being siphoned into Russia from Soviet satellite countries for use in financing espionage and propaganda both here and abroad.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I know, of course, the good intentions of the gentleman from Ohio; but the fact is that the adoption of this amendment would greatly restrict and hamper this program and make its administration extremely difficult, if not impossible. I ask that the amendment be voted down.

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. TACKETT. Why would it tie the hands of those who are to carry out this program to have Congress state that they may not consider a deal with those who are against the fundamental principles of democracy?

Mr. COOPER. This amendment imposes mandatory requirements in the negotiation of these trade agreements affecting countries which themselves are affected by the economic recovery program. The amendment is much more far reaching than appears on the face of it. It will greatly restrict the operation of the program and make it much more difficult of administration.

I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAYS of Ohio) there were—ayes 77, noes 147.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill (H. R. 1211) back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1211) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania moves to recommit the bill (H. R. 1211) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and for other purposes, to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to report same back to the House of Representatives forthwith with the following amendments:

"SEC. 7. Before entering into negotiations concerning any proposed foreign-trade agreement under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, the President shall furnish the United States Tariff Commission (hereinafter in this act referred to as the "Commission") with a list of all articles imported into the United States to be considered for possible modification of duties and other import restrictions, imposition of additional import restrictions, or continuance of existing customs or excise treatment. Upon receipt of such list the Commission shall make an investigation and report to the President the findings of the Commission with respect to each such article as to (1) the limit to which such modification, imposition, or continuance may be extended in order to carry out the purpose of such section 350 without causing or threatening serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or similar articles; and (2) if increases in duties or additional import restrictions are required to avoid serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or similar articles the minimum increases in duties or additional import restrictions required. Such report shall be made by the Commission to the President not later than 120 days after the receipt of such list by the Commission.

"SEC. 8. The President shall, as soon as practicable, but in any event not later than 90 days from the date of this act, institute such proceedings as are necessary to incorporate an escape clause to the same general effect as article XIX of the the general agreements on tariffs and trade in all trade agreements to which the United States is a party."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire may have permission to extend their remarks on the pending bill at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, by leave granted I include herewith the statement made by Mr. O. R. Stockbein, executive secretary, America's Wage Earners' Protective Conference, before the Ways and Means Committee during its hearings on extension of the Trade Agreements Act, which is self-explanatory:

The question has been raised what relations the Tariff Commission should bear to the State Department and its negotiators in the steps leading to a trade agreement.

This is a question that requires an analysis of the time element involved in such preparations and also of the coordination of efforts between two official groups that collaborate to bring about a single result.

In the first place, someone must decide which country or group of countries should be approached about a possible agreement. In reaching such a decision production and trade statistics offer the best guide. Here there is room for consultation between the State Department, the Commerce Department, and possibly the Tariff Commission. Appropriate liaison between such departments and agencies could readily pave the way.

The next step would consist of conversations with the representatives of the foreign countries to determine their willingness to enter into an agreement. This step would, of course, fall to the lot of the State Department.

The third step would call for the preparation of a list of items to be considered for concessions by this country. In preparing such a list collaboration between the State Department, other interested executive departments, and the Tariff Commission would certainly be in order. The Tariff Commission has issued a number of informational reports that would be available for this purpose. Proper liaison would permit the consultation of the commodity experts of the Commission. It would not be necessary for the Tariff Commissioners themselves to act as a body in making such information and assistance available except in the form perhaps of general instructions to the staff.

After appropriate sifting, the State Department would issue for distribution a list of the items on which hearings are to be held. A single hearing by a single agency would be sufficient. Such a hearing should be open to all interested parties, including exporters and importers.

The question now is who should hold the hearings, the Tariff Commission or an interdepartmental body with Tariff Commission representation.

Since this whole question has been raised because of the change brought about by the amendment of 1948, it will be appropriate to consider the situation under which the Tariff Commission would hold the hearings.

No one questions the competence of the Commission in this field. The objections that have been raised relate to the exclusion of the interdepartmental representatives from the procedure. Another objection goes to the amount of time consumed under such a procedure. Objection has also been made that the State Department would lose the value of the Commission's judgment.

There is no reason why the interested executive departments could not detail representatives to sit in the hearings of the Commission. The transcript of the hearings could be made available to them. There need be no loss of contact with the information produced in the hearings.

Up to this point there seems to be nothing at stake beyond departmental prestige.

From this point on we come to the merits of the principal objections. One of these objections, to repeat, is the amount of time consumed between the completion of the hearings and the findings of the Tariff Commission. During this period, it appears, the State Department is locked out, so to speak, from contact with the Tariff Commission.

It should be kept in mind (1) that the State Department and the interdepartmental personnel would have copies of the transcript and other accumulated data that might occupy some of their time. The real difficulty is caused by the fact that the Tariff Commission may find it necessary to supplement the hearings by inquiries of its own. If the hearings themselves provided sufficient information there would be no greater delay in the Commission's proceedings than in the same procedure as carried out by the committee for reciprocity information in the past.

Even during this period there is no reason why Tariff Commission experts could not give technical information and assistance to the representatives of the State Department and other agencies.

To say that the State Department would suffer from delay at this stage is like saying that a judge must hurry his consideration of evidence in order not to waste time. It is a question of adequacy of information, of its proper digestion, and of care in its consideration.

It has been said that the finding of peril points involves an act of precision that is beyond the competence of the Tariff Commission or of any other body. Yet, all State Department concessions also come down to specific points. They end up with precise figures in terms of ad valorem percentages or specific duty rates.

Some concern has been expressed that the Tariff Commission would act in too narrow a field of considerations. This objection carries some weight, but it is not fatal to the quality of the results.

The Tariff Commission having made its findings, these would be communicated to the President (for transmission to the State Department). The State Department would now be ready to negotiate.

Here the question arises whether Tariff Commission personnel should participate in the negotiations. There appears to be no good reason why they should not act in an advisory capacity. Presumably the State Department representatives are the best equipped to do the actual bargaining and it would seem unnecessary that Tariff Commission personnel take part in this function.

Once the negotiations had been completed and the President had proclaimed the agreement the Tariff Commission would issue a public report of its findings.

Mr. BLATNIK. This bill, H. R. 1211, now under consideration by the House is designed to extend the trade-agreements program until June 1951 and to free the President from the shackles placed upon his authority to negotiate trade agreements by the high-tariff boys in the Eightieth Congress. Its passage will represent a repudiation of the false philosophy of economic isolationism and extreme protectionism which characterizes the thinking of many members of the minority party—its passage will make a return to the commercial policies of enlightened self-interest formulated by two great American statesmen, Franklin D. Roosevelt and Cordell Hull.

During last year's debate on the trade-agreements program I opposed its emasculation by the Republican majority, and today I am happy to support this measure which will repair the harm done to this program in the Eightieth Congress and which will again place American trade policy on a rational and sane basis.

There are, in my opinion, two major considerations which justify the passage of H. R. 1211. In the first place, the extension of the trade-agreements program is required to expand American export trade, and an ever-increasing export trade is necessary to help guarantee domestic prosperity. It is a well-known fact that the United States must export 8 to 10 percent of its total production to maintain full employment—that this percentage makes the margin between prosperity and depression.

There can be no doubt but that the reciprocal-trade program has proven its worth as a policy for expanding our foreign trade. Department of Commerce statistics show that during the 4 years following the passage of the original Trade Agreements Act, export trade with trade-agreement countries increased by 63 percent as compared to an increase of only 32 percent to nonagreement countries. Likewise the imports from trade-agreement countries to the United States showed a greater increase than imports from nonagreement countries, the effect of which was to give trade-agreement countries more dollar credits to buy a still greater volume of American goods. Thus we see that the trade-agreements program played a major role in the prewar recovery program by stimulating foreign trade in general and American exports in particular, and thus contributing to prosperity in America and in the world.

In the second place, the passage of this measure is a step toward world peace. It is a generally accepted fact that the major cause of war is the economic rivalries between the Great Powers—that economic considerations far outweigh ideological differences as the root cause of war. Trade wars, tariff wars, and the struggle for markets and raw materials lead to shooting wars. On the other hand, the trade-agreements program has as its major purpose the abolishment of tariff wars by mutual consent of the nations of the world, and the creation of the conditions to permit the free flow of goods and services across State lines, and to make possible the distribution of raw materials through the regular channels of foreign trade. Such a program makes for world peace as it tends to eliminate the economic causes of war—its passage represents a step in building the economic foundations of lasting peace.

Finally, I want to point out that my State of Minnesota has a vital stake in an expanded American export trade, and therefore the people of Minnesota are in general accord with the trade-agreements program. The pattern of Minnesota's economy is most sensitive to changes in the level of foreign trade. The State's agricultural, mining, transportation, and manufacturing industries thrive when American exports increase, and suffer when such exports fall.

A considerable percent of Minnesota production is exported to foreign countries. Minnesota wheat, corn, meat, and flour flows into the channels of foreign trade. My State produces much of the iron ore which is used in the production of farm machinery, trucks, tractors, and automobiles, which are shipped abroad in considerable quantities. Minnesota produces condensed milk, asphalt roofing, rubber goods, and many other items for the export market.

Therefore it is possible for me to say without reservation that Minnesota has profited from the growth of our foreign trade under the trade-agreements program, and that my State has a vital stake in the increased trade which will result from its extension.

Mr. Speaker, it is my considered judgment that the passage of this bill will represent a real contribution to world peace and international prosperity, and that it is necessary to continued prosperity and full employment in the United States. These are ends which we all seek, and I call upon the Members of the House to enact H. R. 1211 into law.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, many historians have maintained that the Smoot-Hawley tariff of 1929, which erected the highest trade barriers of history around this Nation, and which started tariff wars throughout the globe, contributed directly to the economic collapse here and abroad, and sowed the seeds for the rise of Hitlerism and World War II.

The reciprocal agreements recognize the fundamental fact that trade is a two-way business. We cannot go on forever exporting more than we import. Other countries must be able to sell their goods to us if they are to get dollars to buy our products and to repay our loans. When we import foreign goods we improve the standards of Americans as consumers, and at the same time we make it possible to maintain foreign markets for our products. The lowering of trade barriers encourages private trading and free enterprise as distinct from Government trading.

For the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act has been a key part of our dealings with other nations for the past 14 years. Its fundamental purpose has been to promote a freer flow of world commerce, to eliminate retaliatory tariff walls, and to serve peace by stimulating a mutually enriching international exchange of goods on a fair quid pro quo basis. In short, it has been an integral part of our foreign policy—an indispensable economic support to the political aspects of that policy.

Indeed, with our reciprocity program, we have given the economic lead to all nations. Thus, as far as the postwar era is concerned, we have preached the principles of that program in taking the initiative to establish the World Bank and the World Monetary Fund. We have preached them, too, in connection with our successful effort last year to get 22 governments to join with us in the historic and far-reaching Geneva tariff agreement, and they constitute the animating spirit of the 53-nation charter of the International Trade Organization recently negotiated at Havana. Above all—and this is of very great importance—they have been written into the legislation enacted by Congress for the European recovery program, under which the 16 participating countries are expected to pledge themselves to reduce barriers to increase the exchange of goods among themselves.

In such circumstances, when Congress failed to properly renew the reciprocity program, it was telling the world, in effect, that we do not believe in practicing the good things we have preached. Worse, by thus committing a supreme act of inconsistency and backtracking, it was spreading confusion among all our friends abroad, upsetting the operations of the ERP, and planting the impression everywhere of an American drift back to the days of high protectionism; in other words, despite our political internationalism, our economic role was taking on a distinct isolationist slant.

But it is not only for reasons of this sort that the Trade Agreements Act should be renewed without crippling amendments. In the modern world such an act is essential. Without it there can only be tariff wars in which everybody will ultimately be the loser. From the standpoint of our own self-interest, strictly in terms of dollars and cents, we need reciprocity for the sake of American markets abroad. If we do not have it, if our overseas customers run up against protectionism here, then they will not be able to sell enough to us to acquire the money they must have to buy from us. And that is the kind of process that leads to factory shut-downs and deep economic depression.

Accordingly, looked at in any light, either as an instrument of foreign policy or as an instrument to promote our own prosperity, the reciprocal-trade program—which includes escape clauses guarding against serious injury to our domestic producers—must be renewed substantially in the form existing prior to the Eightieth Congress.

AMERICAN FARMERS, THE TRADE-AGREEMENTS PROGRAM, AND H. R. 1211

The American farmer has a bigger stake in prompt passage of H. R. 1211, providing for renewal of the reciprocal-trade-agreements program authority in a workable form, than has any other unit of the American economy. This program has helped and will help to maintain and enlarge markets, abroad and at home, for both our farm products and our industrial goods. Adequate markets for all he can produce are even more vital to the farmer than to the industrialist. A farmer, unlike a big industrialist, cannot shut down his factory, lay off his employees, and live on his reserves when his market goes bad. In order to make a decent living American farmers have to grow and sell more wheat, cotton, tobacco, fruits, and many other crops than this country itself can buy and use. Unless we sell that extra production in other countries the American farmer either suffers or has to have a subsidy from the American taxpayer—and he does not like either alternative.

Since the turn of this century economic changes here and elsewhere have been tending to diminish the relative importance of our agricultural exports. But piled on top of that trend, especially since World War I, there have been rigid restrictions and insuperable barriers imposed by foreign countries against our exports to them. It is this development which the trade-agreements program is designed to cure.

It is nonsense to say that the trade agreements have sold American farmers down the river for the benefit of big industrialists. Through the agreements the United States has obtained as many or more foreign concessions on important farm exports as on industrial exports. Second, no industrial enterprise, under normal conditions, depends so heavily on foreign markets as do some of our major farm crops. Third, the American farmer's biggest and best market is an American market filled with customers who have jobs and are therefore able to buy meat, vegetables, milk and butter, and other farm products. A factory hand with a job making something that can be sold overseas can buy and pay for American farm products. If he loses his job because the foreign market for his product is closed, he cuts down his purchases of cotton overalls and shirts, woolen suits, cigarettes, meat, fresh vegetables and fruits, milk, and butter. That hurts farmers.

Before the war about 10 percent of total American farm production was actually exported, but for some of our most important farm crops the proportion ran far higher. The annual averages in 1934 and 1935 were 39 percent for tobacco, 56 percent for raw cotton, 16 percent for lard, 30 percent for prunes and plums, 34 percent for apricots, 29 percent for raisins, 13 percent for apples, 19 percent for pears, and so on. In 1937 and 1938 the figure for wheat was 12 percent—drought and other factors had held exports down in the earlier period, but since the war they have greatly increased.

All agricultural exports increased during and after the war, of course. In 1946 and 1947 they accounted for 13 to 14 percent of cash farm receipts. But when foreign production recovers from the devastation of war the American farmer will, more than ever before, need a good home market and, at the same time, benefit from the removal of the greatest possible number of barriers to his foreign markets.

Because they simply cannot pay for them, most foreign countries are, at present, strictly limiting their purchases of such things as fruits and tobacco, which are relatively less essential to them. That hurts American growers and the only way in which our foreign markets for these things can be restored or expanded is to enable foreign countries to pay for them and to remove the restrictions on their importation.

This leads to another aspect of the trade-agreements program which is just as important to American farmers as to industry. The American farmer likes to grow all he can, sell all he can, and be paid for it in the market place. He does not want to give his crops away or be paid a Government subsidy for growing them. That is just as true about the products sold in foreign markets as those sold in the home market.

If the United States is going to sell its products in foreign countries it must, in the long run, accept foreign goods and services in payment. During and since the war we have sent abnormally large quantities of goods overseas, but we have been giving many of them away or, at best, selling them on credit. Before the last war about 80 percent of our exports were paid for by imports, but from 1942 to 1947 we have been getting from abroad only about half as much as we have sent abroad. That is not good business for the national economy.

Our Marshall plan is designed to help friendly foreign countries get back on their feet and able to produce goods both for themselves and to exchange for the things we want to sell them. By reducing our own excessive tariffs through trade agreements we can increase the opportunity for other countries to sell their goods in our market. If we don't use the agreements for that purpose, foreign countries will simply be compelled to cut down on their buying of American goods. If they do that, American crops will again pile up in unsalable, price-breaking surpluses, American factories producing for export will shut down, and American workers as well as foreigners will drop out of the American farmer's market. We saw that happen back in the early 1930's. It meant that our living standard and our national income dropped—and the farmer is always the first to feel the pinch when national income goes down. Farm prices fall quicker and farther than other prices.

Some people claim to fear that if United States tariffs are reduced American farmers will suffer from competition with the products of farmers in other countries where living standards and wages are lower than in this country. The record does not show any grounds for such fears. A favorite saying of these people is that the American farmer is entitled to the American market, and so he is if he can supply that market adequately and at reasonable costs. But the size of the home market and the price it offers are far more important to the American farmer than is the exact percentage of it which he supplies. Eighty percent of a big market is better than 100 percent of a collapsed market.

The trade-agreements program is a mechanism for promoting a lively flow of sound trade among nations and helping to give each country a better chance to produce the things it is best fitted to produce and to trade them for goods which other countries can produce to better advantage. Trade agreements help that kind of trade—which is what the American farmer needs—by clearing away unnecessary and excessive governmental restrictions and obstacles to international commerce.

On the direct issue of opening foreign markets to American exports, the trade-agreement concessions obtained by this country from other countries apply to practically every important export product of the United States, agricultural or industrial. Agriculture is benefiting from foreign concessions on wheat, corn, barley, oats, and rice, and on fresh, frozen, dried, and canned fruits and vegetables. We have obtained concessions on various dairy products such as dried and evaporated milk. There are relatively few high foreign tariffs on raw cotton but a number of countries having colonies which they might wish to build up as sources of cotton have nevertheless bound cotton on their free lists or at low tariff rates. Many countries have made concessions on tobacco. There have been other concessions—many of them—on meat products, nuts, seeds, lumber, naval stores, and other things which we export.

Hundreds of American industrial products also benefit from foreign concessions. Those concessions are good for American farmers too because, as has been pointed out, foreign sales of American machinery, typewriters, electrical equipment, radios, automobiles, and other manufactured goods will mean greater demand in this country for farm products.

Next April 13 more countries are to meet to negotiate with each other and with the 23 countries already parties to the general agreement negotiated at Geneva in 1947, for further mutual reduction of trade barriers. The 36 countries, combined, account for much the greatest portion of the world's international trade. Passage of H. R. 1211 will greatly facilitate these negotiations and the United States preparations for them.

The 1948 legislation which this bill will repeal would hamper the President and his helpers in making effective trade agreements. When that legislation was passed the President pointed out its defects and its obstructionist provisions but he said he would do his best to make it work. It is up to this Congress to give the President a legislative implement which will work, to the benefit of the entire national economy.

American farm leaders are, themselves, fully alive to what the trade-agreements program means to this country's agriculture and why it must have a workable legislative basis. During its hearings on H. R. 1211 the Ways and Means Committee received statements from the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Farmers Union, and the Secretary of Agriculture, strongly supporting the bill and giving reasons for their support. Secretary Brannan said, in part:

> That program is the necessary foreign counterpart of a long-term domestic agricultural program.

To sum it all up, the reciprocal trade-agreements program benefits the American farmer in his capacity as a producer by helping to maintain both his foreign and his domestic markets; it helps him as a consumer by helping to make available, at more reasonable costs, more adequate supplies of things he needs and wants from abroad and things which keep American industry in operation; it helps him in his capacity as a part of the national economy because he prospers when the country prospers and when the rest of the world prospers.

H. R. 1211 provides for a workable trade-agreements program and the interests of American farmers demand its immediate passage.

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN THE RECIPROCAL-TRADE-AGREEMENTS PROGRAM—MAY 1948

LOUISIANA

On October 30, 1947, the United States joined with 22 other countries of the world in concluding a General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. This agreement was put into provisional effect on the part of the United States on January 1, 1948, under the authority of the Trade Agreements Act of 1934, as amended.

The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade is the most comprehensive international instrument ever negotiated for the reduction of barriers to world trade, having regard both to the scope of its provisions and to the volume of trade which they affect. The 23 countries participating in the negotiations were Australia, the Belgium-Netherlands-Luxemburg Customs Union, Brazil, Burma, Canada, Ceylon, Chile, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, France, India, the Customs Union of Lebanon and Syria, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Southern Rhodesia, the Union of South Africa, the United Kingdom, and the United States. These countries accounted in 1938 for approximately three-quarters of the international trade of the world.

The schedules of tariff concessions apply to products which are estimated to account for approximately two-thirds of the import trade of the negotiating countries and for substantially half of total world imports. The concessions include the complete elimination of certain duties and preferences, reductions of duty and preference, the binding of duties at existing levels, and the binding of duty-free treatment.

The general provisions of the agreement are comparable to the general provisions of past reciprocal trade agreements and are necessary to safeguard and make effective the tariff concessions. The provisions of the general agreement have been adapted to present conditions and to the fact that this is an agreement among several countries rather than merely between two countries.

The agreement was put into effect provisionally on or before January 1, 1948, by Australia, the Belgian-Netherlands-Luxemburg Customs Union, Canada, Cuba, France, the United Kingdom, and the United States, which represent over 80 percent of the foreign trade of all negotiating countries. Other participating countries have until June 30, 1948, to put the agreement provisionally into effect. The agreement will enter definitively into force upon deposit with the Secretary General of the United Nations of formal acceptances on behalf of countries making up 85 percent of the foreign trade of all negotiating countries.

The agreement is a demonstration of the kind of constructive work that the United Nations can do in the economic field. Announcement of the agreement created an auspicious atmosphere for the opening of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment which convened at Havana on November 21, 1947, and within the long-term framework which the agreement establishes it should be possible for the reconstruction of Europe under the Marshall plan to proceed with more confidence that efforts to restore world economy will not again be defeated by commercial warfare between the great trading powers.

What the United States got in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade

Tariff preferences affecting a significant part of United States trade with countries in the British Commonwealth have been substantially reduced, and preferences on a considerable list of products which the United States exports to the various countries of the Commonwealth have been eliminated entirely. Under the terms of the agreement no new preference may be created and no existing preference may be increased, whether or not on products listed in the schedules of the agreement.

Total United States exports in 1939 of products covered by the new concessions amounted to over $1,400,000,000. Regardless of whether or not the agricultural and industrial products actually produced in Louisiana entered foreign trade in large quantities, the prices Louisiana producers received were directly improved by the fact that similar products were simultaneously being exported from the United States in considerable amounts, and, consequently, were not put on the domestic market in competition with Louisiana products as most certainly would have happened if the entire supply had to be consumed within this country. Some of the principal Louisiana products for which concessions were obtained from other countries are:

Rice and rice products: The United Kingdom reduced the duty on husked and unhusked rice.

The Belgium-Netherlands-Luxemburg Customs Union bound milled rice duty-free and placed a ceiling on the monopoly fee.

Cuba bound the existing rates on imports up to 325,000,000 pounds or more of rice annually.

France reduced the duty on husked rice in the whole grain and on breakfast cereals of rice.

Canada also made concessions on certain rice and rice products.

Strawberries: Canada, which before the war was by far the largest foreign market for United States strawberries, made a seasonal reduction on fresh strawberries.

Cotton: The United Kingdom, the Belgium-Netherlands-Luxemburg Customs Union, Canada, Cuba, Czechoslovakia and Norway bound raw cotton on the free list.

France bound raw cotton, linters and wastes on the free list.

Australia bound certain raw cotton on the free list and granted a substantial duty reduction on all other raw cotton, eliminating the preference.

Cottonseed and cottonseed products: Canada eliminated the duty and preferences on cottonseed.

The Belgium-Netherlands-Luxemburg Customs Union bound the monopoly fee on cottonseed oil if for industrial purposes.

Cuba bound the duty on cottonseed oil.

Cotton broadwoven goods: Cuba, Chile, Canada, and Newfoundland granted concessions on cotton broadwoven goods.

Hosiery: The United Kingdom, New Zealand, and the Union of South Africa granted concessions on hosiery.

Wood and wood products: The United Kingdom granted three concessions in the lumber schedule covering wood of the coniferous species. Concessions were also granted on square sawn hardwood and sawn staves.

Australia removed the duty and preference on certain undressed staves and reduced the duty and preference on other undressed staves. Australia also reduced the duty and cut the Canadian preference in half on a number of timber items.

China bound the duty on sawn softwood lumber.

South Africa reduced the duty and preference on unmanufactured softwood.

Czechoslovakia bound the duty-free treatment of non-European wood.

Norway bound hickory and oak lumber on the free list.

Canada reduced the duty on wood furniture.

Paper and paper products: China reduced duties on several kinds of writing and printing paper, and bound rates on numerous paper products such as paper napkins, towels, office forms and paper handkerchiefs.

New Zealand granted a reduction in the duty on paper.

Newfoundland reduced rates on certain types of paper and stationery products.

Cuba lowered the duty on cardboard containers in which goods are imported.

Petroleum refinery products: The United Kingdom bound the rate on paraffin wax and petroleum jelly.

France granted reductions on gasoline and lubricating oil.

Southern Rhodesia and the Union of South Africa bound their duties on lubricating oil.

Czechoslovakia granted reductions on paraffin and petroleum jelly.

The Belgium-Netherlands-Luxemburg Customs Union bound paraffin and petroleum duty free.

Lebanon bound lubricating oil at the existing rate.

Brazil reduced the duty on certain petroleum oil.

Chile reduced a duty on lubricating oil, on lubricating grease and on paraffin.

China granted duty reductions on lubricating oil and grease.

Sulfur: The United Kingdom bound sulfur on the free list.

France bound raw sulfur duty-free.

Czechoslovakia bound sulfur duty-free.

The Belgium-Netherlands-Luxemburg Customs Union bound crude sulfur duty-free.

Norway bound sulfur duty-free.

Carbon black: The United Kingdom bound the rate on carbon black.

France bound carbon black free of duty.

Australia eliminated the duty on carbon black.

What the United States gave in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade

Concessions were made to other countries on products accounting for $1,766,000,000 or 78 percent of total United States imports in 1939. However, bindings of the tariff status at the 1945 levels accounted for $1,259,000,000 of this total and reductions in duty were made on products the imports of which into the United States were valued, in 1939, at only about $500,000,000.

Some of the principal Louisiana products on which reductions were made by the United States:

Sugar: The duty on sugar was reduced 25 cents per 100 pounds. During the war quotas, which have regulated imports of sugar into the United States since 1934, were suspended. As of January 9, 1948, quotas again became applicable pursuant to special sugar legislation passed by Congress in 1947. Under this legislation the Secretary of Agriculture is required to determine annually the year's sugar requirements of the United States and this quantity is allocated to the different supplying areas according to a formula provided in the statute. It is this stipulated quantity available for consumption which determines the United States price of sugar and the tariff under this system thus loses much of its importance, as a protective device.

Unfinished petroleum oils: The excise tax on imports of unfinished oils was reduced from one-half cent to one-fourth cent a gallon. In 1939 taxable imports of unfinished oils, including topped crude, were valued at $4,541,000, nearly all from the Netherlands West Indies. However, more than half of the reported imports consisted of topped crude on which the excise tax was reduced in December 1939. In 1946 taxable imports amounted to $30,000, nearly all from Canada; during the first 8 months of 1947 they amounted to $365,000, nearly all from Canada. Since unfinished oils are products not ready for use, most of the shipments which appear in published statistics are intracompany transfers or transactions between affiliated companies.

All concessions made by the United States were formulated within the limits and according to the procedures specified by the Trade Agreements Act. This Government is exercising its right under the agreement generally to withhold concessions which are of primary interest to those countries which were represented at Geneva until they have put their new tariff schedule into effect.

ADDENDUM, SEPTEMBER 1948

Since preparation of the accompanying material certain developments have significantly altered the facts presented there.

1. Twenty-two of the twenty-three countries (all except Chile) participating in negotiation of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade at Geneva, Switzerland, in 1947, signed the Protocol of Provisional Application before June 30, 1948, and tariff concessions provided for in the agreement are now in effect as regards those countries.

2. The Congress in June 1948 enacted Public Law 792 (approved June 26, 1948) extending to June 30, 1949, the President's authority to negotiate trade agreements and providing for certain changes in the procedure heretofore followed in such negotiations.

The new law:

(a) Prohibits the Tariff Commission from participating in any decision regarding the terms of an agreement or in negotiations for an agreement. The Commission will, however, continue to furnish factual data to other Government agencies for use in formulating and negotiating agreements. The agencies which, under law or executive order, now advise the President on trade-agreement matters are the Departments of State Commerce, Agriculture, the Treasury, and Labor, the Military Establishment, and the Economic Cooperation Administration;

(b) Requires the President, before negotiating an agreement, to submit to the Tariff Commission a list of all products on which possible United States tariff concessions may be considered;

(c) Requires the Tariff Commission, not more than 120 days after receiving the above list, to conduct hearings and an investigation and to advise the President as to (1) the limit to which tariff concessions may go without causing or threatening serious injury to domestic industries, and (2) the minimum tariff increases or additional import restrictions, if any, required to avoid such injury;

(d) Requires that the President, if he concludes an agreement involving greater tariff concessions than those specified in the above report, or failing to include increased import restrictions recommended by the Commission, must report the agreement to Congress not more than 30 days after it is concluded, together with a statement of his reasons for not following the recommendations of the Commission, which thereupon must file with the Congress a copy of its previous report to the President.

Existing procedure, under which the Committee for Reciprocity Information holds public hearings on all aspects of a trade agreement before its negotiation, is provided for in executive orders and will continue unchanged, except that the Tariff Commission will no longer participate in these hearings or in decisions based on information and views of interested parties presented there.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, having been unable to gain the floor during the consideration of the Trade Extension Act, I wish to make the following comments and observations with respect to that legislation.

For years the question of tariff was the outstanding issue between the two parties, and it was made a political football. The vast majority of the American people, however, demanded that the issue of tariffs be taken out of politics, and after many efforts, a Tariff Commission was created, with a nonpolitical soul, notwithstanding the opposition who for years thrived on high tariffs.

Upon the urgent recommendations of business and the American people as a whole, with the end pointed toward the increasing of our foreign commerce and enabling the United States to export its great surpluses in many commodities, we succeeded in passing the original Trade Agreements Act of 1934.

A brief review of the history of tariff legislation recalls to our minds the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill—the Republican high tariff bill—which produced, as a result of its unfair provisions, uncounted and wholesale trouble for our industrial and economic establishment. With the passage of this legislation which created a barrier of economic goods against a necessary trade-amongnations policy, our country aroused counterattacks against our foreign economy of goods, and as a result, barriers were raised against American goods which could easily have found markets throughout the world. Under this Republican measure, infant industries which had no reason for securing governmental assistance, were subsidized to the extent that they were permitted to compete with foreign products, which could have been imported by the American people at a cheaper price and sometimes at a better grade.

The record will also show that our foreign trade fell as a result of this unfair legislation, which was directly responsible, in part, for our falling into a depression out of which it required a Democratic administration to lead us. Profiting by this mistake, the Democratic Congress, led by that great sage and statesman, Cordell Hull, brought about a necessary reversal of this policy of closing our market doors to a world anxious to receive them.

There was then enacted a group of reciprocal trade agreements which recognized the strength and weaknesses of our industrial and agricultural products. It was inevitable that we should admit that we could not manufacture all the goods which the American people needed due to climatic and labor conditions, since many countries could raise products and manufacture them at a cost much less than our farms and factories permitted. As a result, the American people were brought face to face with the realization that trade with the peoples abroad begets understanding and friendliness, as well as a profitable exchange of goods. The Hull reciprocal trade agreements, always opposed by the Republicans, who still bask in the shadows of a high-tariff policy, which today is outdated and antiquated, proved an immediate success. An examination of the records of our import and export trade during the period of their existence speaks strongly for their continuance.

H. R. 1211 entitled "The Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1949," now under consideration, in effect does three things, namely: (a) repeals the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948, (b) extends for 3 years from June 12, 1948, the authority of the President to enter into foreign trade agreements under section 350 of the Tariff Act, (c) and effects three minor changes in the original Trade Agreements Act of 1934, as amended. The effect of section 6 of the new bill, enables the United States to raise, rather than to lower, certain tariff rates, pursuant to the general agreement on tariffs and trade, negotiated at Geneva in 1947.

This bill effects a return to the procedures that were followed from 1934 to 1948, under the then existing Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, which as you know, resulted in the successful completion of some 42 agreements. Under the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948, as passed by the Republican Eightieth Congress, the President was bound by a hampering procedure in administering this law. The new act will return us to the procedures which have effectively been proven in the past.

The trade-agreements program insures us against a possible loss of the huge investment that we have made in the European recovery program, by putting into effect a powerful and practical method of expanding our international trade. By allowing other countries to sell us a greater portion of their raw material and other essential materials, we make available purchasing power which is used to obtain more of our own export products on a paying basis, and not as gifts. Business, labor, farming groups, and the consumer, are all vitally interested in the maintenance of these trade agreements, as they point toward the very essence of our national and international well-being.

I have observed that Great Britain, due to financial aid that we have been and are giving her, has been and is extending its exports. In the last few days, however, she has complained bitterly that Germany, through its cartels, is competing unfairly with Britain's exports. She also complains that Japan, due to its cheap labor, is underselling Great Britain in many quarters of the world.

With the United States aid given to Germany, Japan, Great Britain, and other countries, we are building up a great source of competition for our own export trade. Nevertheless I am certain that this Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1949 will not effect or retard our own exports or our own economy, and further, will not deprive us of the foreign trade which is so badly needed for our own great surpluses.

Since the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act, as amended, is the arch of our bipartisan foreign economic policy, a failure to enact legislation such as this, would in effect, be making our American leadership in world economic affairs subservient to the interests of a few producers. The foreign relations of the United States are interdependent upon and directly related to the doctrines of peace and freedom, for which mankind is constantly striving. The delusive and artificial Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948 that seriously affected and disabled the Reciprocal Trade program, will be remedied by the passage of this bill.

The issue is that again of isolation-in-trade attempting, to be self-supporting, which we are not and cannot be, as against recognition of the fact that in just, fair, and equitable trade agreements, we can, as Americans, play an important part in the rehabilitation of the world's economy, as well as benefiting our own industries and our own social and industrial life.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the Waltham Watch Co. in its financial report for last year, which was issued yesterday, reveals that company had a deficit last year of $1,610,000. In 1947, the company reported a loss of about $300,000. A company that year after year loses money cannot long stay in business. It cannot continue to employ people.

One speaker today probably gave the reason why the Waltham Watch Co. has been losing money. That reason was that the Swiss shipped 9,000,000 watches into the United States last year under trade treaties that had greatly reduced the tariff on Swiss watches.

I spoke earlier in this debate about the harm that might be done to the crab industry, the filbert-nut industry, and the shingle industry if trade treaties are negotiated too hastily and without all members of an industry, labor and management alike, having a full opportunity to present their case.

This bill by eliminating the Tariff Commission as an agency to investigate how any tariff may affect any industry, certainly does not safeguard the interest of either workers or manufacturers.

This noon I had lunch with a western lumberman. I asked him if lumber was now being shipped into the United States from Canada. He told me that lumber imports from Canada, particularly of low-grade lumber, have increased enormously during recent months. If this importation of lumber from Canada continues to increase it certainly will throw many of our western sawmills out of operation and cause many western sawmill workers to lose their jobs. This is particularly true of the smaller mills, the mills that operate with crews of 10 to 40 men each.

We should not sell these little sawmill operators and the men they employ down the river. Surely, we should not sell them down the river without providing them their American right to be fully heard by appropriate committees or commissions of the Federal Government. Under this bill these operators and these workers will get adequate hearings. This bill makes the Tariff Commission a bipartisan, nonpolitical Commission a dead duck. Under this bill, when an industry and its employees are about to be liquidated by the State Department on the auction block of foreign trade, neither its management nor its employees are afforded any adequate, impartial hearing. This is not fair. This is not just.

I have lived all my life in a lumbering community. Many is the time I have seen most of the lumber mills of my home town idle while those in Canada were operating at full capacity. These Canadian mills operated while our American lumber mills were idle because the price of labor and of logs was much lower in Canada than in the United States.

The same threat that exists in this bill to the lumber industry also exists in this bill for the plywood.

During the past year, large eastern building material jobbing houses, hoping to profit by becoming agents for Canadian and Mexican concerns, have made a strenuous effort to persuade Congress to remove the present tariff on Canadian and Mexican plywood.

Were this plywood tariff to be reduced more than 13,000 American plywood workers who are employed in 43 plywood plants in Oregon, Washington, and California would be the principal sufferers.

The wage rates paid by Canadian plywood manufacturers are about 6 percent lower than those prevailing on the American side of the line. Also, log prices in Canada are much lower than in the United States. The differential between Mexican labor and American labor is even greater than that which exists between Canadian and United States labor.

If tariffs on plywood should be reduced more foreign plywood will invade the American market, our American plants will be forced to curtail operations or our American plywood workers eventually will have to accept lower wages in order to meet this foreign competition.

None of these eventualities should be permitted to happen. Our American plywood industry has been doing a good job in increasing production, in meeting building material demands.

In 1945, the production of fir plywood in the United States was 1,200,000,000 square feet; in 1946, it was 1,400,000,000 square feet; in 1947, it was 1,600,000,000 square feet; and in 1948, it was an estimated 2,000,000,000 square feet. It is now contemplated that the plywood output for 1949 will be 2,700,000,000 square feet or about two and one-half times the production of 4 years ago. Certainly, with such a record, the plywood industry has done a good job.

The plywood industry's management and workers should not be penalized by the adoption of new tariff policies in plywood, certainly not without giving the industry and its workers the fullest opportunity to be heard. This bill does not provide full hearings for the plywood industry, either its management or its workers, in the event the State Department should undertake to wipe out the present tariff that is imposed on Canadian and Mexican plywood workers.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for H. R. 1211, for extension of reciprocal trade treaty powers of the President, after voting for the motion to recommit to include in that act a means of determining the so-called peril points—and to require escape clauses to be incorporated in trade treaties negotiated with other countries. I believe it is important that the Federal Trade Commission be given direction to establish these so-called peril points or tariff rates below which it is dangerous to go in the protection of American industry and agriculture from cheap labor and slave labor foreign competition. I also believe it highly important that all trade treaties include an escape clause, because we are entering upon an era dangerous to the welfare of the American people in matters of foreign trade.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, it is well known or should be well known that the most important agricultural crops are protected absolutely. They are protected not by tariffs under the Reciprocal Trade Treaty Act, but by quota import limitations established by Executive order of the President under the Agricultural Adjustment Act and the Soil Conservation Act. The principal agricultural products so protected are short staple cotton, wheat, rice, cattle, dairy products such as butter and milk, and perhaps one or two others. There is also provision in the law which will enable the President even to grant export subsidies on agricultural products. This arises under authority of law contained in the Agricultural Adjustment Act and the Soil Conservation Act. They are still in effect. These authorities are as follows:

United States Code, title 7, section 608 (a) ?—the AAA:

"Subject to the provisions of subsection (1) of this section, the Secretary of Agriculture shall make payments, out of any moneys available for such payments, in such amounts as he finds, upon the basis of the investigation made pursuant to subsection (1) of this section, to be fair and reasonable and best calculated to effectuate the declared policy of this chapter:

"(a) To remove from the normal channels of trade and commerce quantities of any basic agricultural commodity or product thereof;

"(b) To expand domestic or foreign markets for any basic agricultural commodity or product thereof;

"(c) In connection with the production of that part of any basic agricultural commodity which is required for domestic consumption."

United States Code, title 7, section 624:

"624 (a). Whenever the President has reason to believe that any one or more articles are being or are practically certain to be imported into the United States under such condition and in sufficient quantities as to render or tend to render ineffective or materially interfere with any program or operation undertaken, or to reduce substantially the amount of any product, processed in the United States from any commodity subject to * * * he shall cause an immediate investigation to be made by the United States Tariff Commission. * * *

"(b) If, on the basis of such investigation and report to him of findings and recommendations made, in connection therewith, the President finds the existence of such facts, he shall by proclamation impose such fees on, or such limitations on the total quantity of, any article or articles which may be entered or withdrawn from warehouse * * * provided, that no limitation shall be imposed on the total quantity which may be imported from any country which reduces such permissible quantity to less than 50 percent of the average annual quantity of such article which was imported from such country during the period from January 1, 1929, to December 31, 1933, both dates inclusive."

Under authority of these sections of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and the Soil Conservation Act, the import of short staple cotton is limited to approximately one-fourth of 1 percent of the amount of short staple cotton raised in the United States. That is almost a complete embargo against importation of that product. The import quota restriction on wheat permits the importation of approximately one-tenth of 1 percent of the amount of wheat grown in the United States, which is an even more perfect embargo against the importation of wheat into the United States. While the quota restrictions on the importation of cattle are not quite so severe, nevertheless under another section of the code relating to agriculture, no cattle or unprocessed meats can be imported from countries where foot-and-mouth disease exists, and among those countries are our chief competitors in the growing of cattle, Argentina, Brazil, and Mexico. Our own cattle growers are, therefore, almost 100 percent protected, not by tariff under the Reciprocal Trade Treaty Act, or even the so-called Smoot-Hawley Act, but under quarantine restrictions established under the Agricultural Code. During the war, the Quartermaster Corps of the Army purchased great quantities of Argentine beef for the use of our soldiers abroad. Recently they have offered to purchase additional large quantities of canned beef for our troops that still remain abroad, and in spite of the high price of meat in the United States, our domestic growers of beef cattle have seriously protested the use of such beef by the Army.

In addition to the embargoes which I have mentioned, we have another law on the books which protects completely, not by tariff, but by a curious type of embargo, the importation into the United States of Virginia-type tobacco. As I have indicated, that embargo arises in a peculiar way. In the thirties it was found that Virginia-type tobacco seed when planted in regions such as south China, would produce crops of Virginia-type tobacco just as good as that grown in our Piedmont sections of the central and South Atlantic States, mainly Maryland, Virginia, and North and South Carolina. However, if the seed from the plants grown elsewhere were again planted, then the second crop was not as good as the first, and the third crop so grown was not as good as the second. Therefore, it was necessary in those regions of the world, for tobacco growers there to purchase Virginia-type tobacco seed in the United States. Under an act sponsored by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KERR], the Congress prohibited the exportation of tobacco seed and live plants. In so doing we shut off completely production of Virginia-type tobacco elsewhere in the world, and consequently, not only protected the foreign markets from any competition whatever in that type of tobacco from competition of foreign-grown Virginia-type tobacco but at the same time, protected absolutely the domestic market from the importation into the United States of Virginia-type tobacco.

Hence, through laws enacted by the Congress in the 1930's—laws which are wholly unrelated to the Reciprocal Trade Treaty Acts and which the present Trade Treaty Act in nowise affects, we have on our statute books not merely protection in the form of tariff, but outright embargoes against the importation of agricultural products of the type I have named from any competition whatsoever by foreign producers of such products. It is easy enough for Representatives from areas growing tobacco, cotton, cattle, rice, and wheat to support the Trade Treaty Acts, if they are only interested in their own districts; they themselves while generally professing a desire to free the trade channels of the world through reduction of American tariffs, have no need for tariff protection themselves. They are just completely protected by laws and Executive orders pursuant to these laws which puts embargoes against any competitive products coming into the United States. They can rest easy, knowing that their districts are 100 percent protected. It is a curious thing how so many of these people can advocate tariff reductions on items produced in other parts of the United States, and wax enthusiastic over freeing the channels of trade, when the channels of foreign trade for their own district's products are protected by embargoes which are the equivalent of the highest tariffs that can possibly be placed on these products. It is a travesty of the highest order.

But even further than this, Mr. Speaker, there are other ways in which certain agricultural products are protected. There is for example the Cuban sugar agreement, which establishes an import quota on sugar, and which sets up in the several sugar-beet and cane growing States, acreage limitations. The States of California, Louisiana, and Florida, to say nothing of certain other States capable of growing sugar, want very much to see less Cuban sugar imported into the United States, and larger quotas established for domestic production. These people would like to have the domestic sugar market entirely to themselves, but certain powerful interests in the United States likewise have interests in the sugar plantations and cane mills in Cuba and Puerto Rico and are able to maintain a considerable share of the domestic market for what is called off-shore sugar, but the battle between the domestic growers and the domestic owners of off-shore production results in a compromise each year and quota limitations placed on both sides.

Mr. Speaker, one can go on to describe in further detail how the important single crops in terms of production and the millions of persons engaged in the growing or processing of such crops are completely protected from serious competition without benefit of tariffs. They do not need tariffs—they are not interested in tariffs. They have protection a lot better than any tariff could provide. In most cases they just embargo the importation of these crops altogether but under a different set of laws than the laws applying to tariffs or trade treaties. They talk glibly of tariff reductions, because tariff reductions do not apply to them, and cannot apply to them so long as the mile-high wall of protection under the import-quota system stands as their fortress. To my mind it is completely unfair to the users of other kinds of agricultural products not so protected by import quotas for these people who are protected to cry for tariff reductions. These other products are, of course, produced in relatively small quantities in the United States and in limited areas, but these products are just as important to the United States and to the growers of these products, small in number as they are, as the greater crops grown in wider areas. Apparently protection is offered, not on the basis of protection per se, but on the basis of how many people are engaged in the business. I could mention the fact that in my own State, California, the growers of walnuts, almonds, olives, and other nut crops, as well as certain fruit crops which result in dried fruit, are completely bare of import-quota protection, and yet serious tariff reductions on these products have been made. It seems there are not enough of these growers to raise a voice of such volume as to be heard in the nooks and crannies of the State Department in Washington.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to discuss the foreign trade program of the United States from a different angle. The mass-production industries of our country at the present time have no fear of foreign competition, because mass production was developed in the United States and, practically speaking, exists only in the United States. Hence, the mass-production industries, these industries which have made possible the millions of radios, typewriters, telephones, automobiles, electric lights, and gadgets of all kinds at prices so low that nearly everyone in the United States can afford them, do not today have any fear of foreign competition for their products. Naturally, they are quite anxious for tariff reductions on any and every product of the United States, because they know very well that in order for them to be able to sell also in foreign markets, the foreigners must be able likewise to sell in American markets. These people, as I say, do not need tariff because they are the lowest cost producers in the world in their respective lines, but they do need dollar credits established abroad which they can absorb by exporting their articles. So we have two large groups pressing for tariff reduction. On the one hand, the five or six principal agricultural crop producers are protected by import quota restrictions, and on the other hand, the mass-production industries which are protected by virtue of the fact that they are the world's lowest cost producers. In between these two groups, we have all the lesser crops of agriculture and all of the smaller more personalized industries of the United States. Are we to permit producers of the lesser agricultural crops and the smaller manufacturers to be run out of business, just because they do not have a strong enough political voice—or are we to look at the United States as a whole? If we do not do that, we may someday wake up to find that these lesser producers are out of business, and they also involve in the aggregate millions and millions of people. The net result will be that we will have in the United States a few large mass-production industries employing millions of people, and the large agricultural producers employing millions of people. But the small farmer and the small-business man will have departed into the limbo of the forgotten. Big industries and big agriculture are important, Mr. Speaker, but to my way of thinking, little agriculture and little industries are more important, because they constitute the backbone of America, the backbone of freedom and individual enterprise. When they are gone, where will the young man turn to find a place where he may establish himself and exercise that vaunted freedom of opportunity which we say is a birthright of every American?

To conclude this dissertation, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that not since 1939 has it been possible for the trade treaties negotiated pursuant to the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, to have an opportunity to demonstrate forcibly to the American people the full consequences of the program thus initiated. Since September 1, 1939, the most important producing sections of the world have been at war, and since 1941 the United States has been at war. No peace has yet been declared, although hostilities have ceased as such in the western world. Nevertheless, no one will deny that while the hot war has been turned off, for the time being at least, we have been engaged in a cold war all over the world. During hostilities there was in effect the well-known lend-lease program. Trade treaties were of no effect during that period. It may be recalled that at the same time we were engaged in Government purchasing of strategic materials and Government free distribution of arms, ammunition, food, and clothing all over the world. If any private business whatever was done, such business was accomplished under the export-license system. Since the end of hostilities, the United States has been spreading largess throughout the world, first by postwar loans to our ex-war allies, and through the Latin-American good will program, initiated by Nelson Rockefeller. Now we are engaged in spreading it even more thickly, through the so-called Marshall plan or the European recovery program or the Economic Cooperative Administration, or whatever you want to call it, but, nevertheless, to the tune of about $8,000,000,000 per year. Through this program, we have distributed our surpluses to foreign countries, meaning to foreign governments, thereby taking the surpluses off the American market—thereby removing the safety valve on prices. How long can the American people bear this burden, and what will happen when it stops?

Let us take a look at the present picture and what the results may be in the future, of our actions today. By giving our surpluses away and giving them away for free, Mr. Speaker, we are sustaining high prices at home. High prices cause labor to ask for and get higher wages. It is proposed that we now increase the minimum wage of the American people to 75 cents an hour in most cases and $1 per hour in some others. That is practically double the present minimum-wage provision. Wages are the highest in our history today. On the other hand, we have agriculturists who are protected by the so-called parity formula—a formula which establishes a price for farm production for the five or six principal crops in the United States based upon the costs of those industrial products which the farmer must buy. These crops are also protected against foreign competition by import-quota restrictions, as I have pointed out before. These farmers also have a floor built under themselves by virtue of laws which permit them to borrow from the Government up to 90 percent of the parity prices established for their crops. The higher industrial prices go, the higher parity prices go, and, of course, the higher 90 percent of parity is, and so we ask ourselves that ancient question: Why is a mouse when it spins? and the answer is: The higher the fewer. We think also, Mr. Speaker, of that fable we learned in childhood about the Pied Piper of Hamlin, as we see our children's natural fortitude debauched by something-for-nothing propaganda at every turn.

When the Marshall plan stops giving away American surpluses without charge to foreign governments—when minimum wages have been established at twice their former values, when the prices of agriculture's principal crops have been pegged at similarly high value, when tariff protection no longer exists for the lesser crops and industrial products, when Europe has recovered its productive capacity and starts exporting to the United States in earnest, I wonder what is going to happen in the United States. Think it over.

I support the present bill because it can be of little effect so long as the Marshall plan is in effect. But I demand that we have escape clauses which will permit us to defend ourselves, our small industries, and our small farmers against the products of cheap labor abroad, and in some cases, not cheap, but slave labor, and I think that it is necessary that the Tariff Commission stand guard, ready to tell us what the peril points are, so that we may know how to act when the avalanche of foreign goods buries employment in the United States.

Mr. SCUDDER. Mr. Speaker, on leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to discuss H. R. 1211, now under consideration. As I view the pending bill, it is designed to accomplish three things: Repeal the peril-point report of the bipartisan Tariff Commission; repeal the escape clause from the Reciprocal Trade Act of 1948; and extend the Reciprocal Trade Act for a period of 3 years.

The Tariff Commission is a bipartisan commission appointed by the President to hold hearings and make investigations of all proposed tariff revisions. The President must seek advice and obtain expert knowledge in arriving at conclusions in reducing tariff rates to be sure that our domestic economy is not in jeopardy. The duty of the Tariff Commission is to make investigations and hold hearings to be able to determine to what length adjustments may be made in our tariff structure so as not to injure the domestic producers of the commodities concerned.

The Tariff Commission in rendering their report to the President must take into consideration any elements such as the wage schedules in the country involved as against our American standard, cost of transportation, accessibility of raw material, and whether or not these trade agreements might be at a disadvantage to our national defense.

Before the President could reduce tariffs below the peril point of the industry involved, he would be compelled to submit his recommendations to the Congress for their approval.

Many thousands of treaties are now in effect, the most of which do not carry an escape clause. On November 7 and December 17 the President submitted lists of commodities on which concessions would be negotiated with 11 countries. On December 7 the Tariff Commission began hearings, and on March 5 the peril-point report will be completed and ready for use in the pending negotiations in April.

Arguments were presented that the process was cumbersome and caused delay. This was offset by reports to the contrary, and that work in preparing information setting forth these "peril points" was well in hand. The tariff on some 400 articles will be considered at the April 1949 trade conference. A few of the articles which this conference will consider are: olive oil, cherries, nuts, canned tomatoes, sugar, fish, hides and skins, wallboard, plywood, box shook, matches, and so forth. A reduction in tariff on these commodities could adversely affect the economy of my district. We should have the advices of the Tariff Commission to establish the "peril point" in each of these articles under consideration, and also should have the escape clause in the event experience would show that the industry was being harmed by the negotiations entered into.

If the past can be an indication for what might happen in the future, these conferences usually result in the lowering of the tariff thereby placing the farmer, industry, and the laboring man at a further competitive disadvantage. The almond, filbert, and walnut growers are producing a surplus. A tariff reduction might bring chaos to these growers. The fish industry and fishermen cannot stand more discrimination. Many of our lumber mills have shut down. I am informed that lumber imports from Canada have increased enormously during recent months. If this continues, it will close more of our mills and throw many of our men out of work. A movement is on to try and have the tariff removed on Canadian and Mexican plywood. Should this be accomplished, more than 13,000 American workers in plywood plants on the Pacific coast would be in jeopardy. Plywood production in the United States is a comparatively new industry. The output of these plants in 1949 will be 2,700,000,000 square feet, or two and one-half times the production 4 years ago. Fifty-five million jeweled watches have been imported since 1941. The watch industry in this country is about ruined, and thousands of employees are out of work. The glass industry of West Virginia is almost out of business, causing great hardship and unemployment. No escape clause is provided for these industries.

During the hearings on this bill, 63 organizations appeared in support of maintaining the peril-point report of the Tariff Commission contained in the 1948 Act. Among them were The National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation, National Council Farmer Cooperatives, United States Hop Growers Association, California Fish Canners Association, Inc., Mining industry of California, farm organizations, manufacturers, labor organizations, trade organizations, and many others.

In his testimony before the committee, Albert S. Gross, master of the National Grange, said:

We do not believe H. R. 1211 will provide the type of tariff system the nation needs. We would like to see sound tariff legislation far more comprehensive than anything contemplated in this bill, and we fear the enactment of such a measure would merely serve to assure the continuance of an unsound and objectionable situation for another 2 years—a period of readjustment in trade when we will probably need a sound tariff policy more than at any time in recent years. We would much prefer to see the committee devote its time to the enactment of such legislation and let the present law stand until a sound and effective tariff measure can be passed.

Mr. Ray B. Wiser, President of the California Farm Bureau Federation, states that—

Further tariff reductions should be made only after careful consideration of effects which such reductions may have on the industry affected. The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1948 contained provision for a tariff commission investigation and study of commodities for which tariff adjustment was contemplated and the establishment by the commission of a range within which adjustments could be made without severe adverse effects upon the industry involved. * * * We would therefore respectfully recommend your participation in efforts to obtain retention of the present provisions of the 1948 act providing for tariff commission investigation and reporting on the effects of proposed adjustments prior to the actual negotiations of trade agreements.

I cannot countenance the American taxpayer lending $300,000,000 to Great Britain to buy wheat from Canada when our warehouses are bulging, and no buyers; or to see our Government support a potato deal with a $200,000,000 loss for 1948, and permit Canadian potatoes to be imported and sold under our support price.

During the hearings and various debates, evidence has been brought out concerning the loyalty of the employees in the State Department charged with the responsibility of trade negotiations, which makes me feel doubly strong that the Tariff Commission should establish the peril point and that the escape clause should remain in the bill. It seems to be a foregone conclusion that our efforts are futile in trying to amend the pending bill to include the peril-point report and the escape clause. I shall vote for their inclusion and be one of a loyal opposition to vote against the final passage of the bill, and in so doing, express my feeling that our American industries, farmers, and workmen are not adequately protected, and that the American people should be warned to stop, look, and listen, lest it be too late.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

JOSEF CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 19.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to announce before this resolution comes up for consideration that if there is prolonged discussion and the offering of amendments or any attempt to call the roll, the resolution will not be passed today.

The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas on September 18, 1946, Archbishop Aloysius Stepinac, Roman Catholic primate of Yugoslavia, was arrested on charges of committing "crimes against the people" and of "being the center of terrorist opposition" to the Government of Yugoslavia; and

Whereas on October 11, 1946, the said Archbishop Stepinac was sentenced to imprisonment for a term of 16 years and deprived of his civil rights for 5 years; and

Whereas the conduct of the trial of the said Archbishop Stepinac which resulted in such sentence was a travesty on justice and a violation of the fundamental rights of man; and

Whereas on December 26, 1948, Josef Cardinal Mindszenty, Roman Catholic primate of Hungary, was arrested on "suspicion of treason, attempting to overthrow the democratic regime, espionage, and foreign-currency abuses" and has been held incommunicado since such date; and

Whereas the charges upon which the said Cardinal Mindszenty was arrested constitute distortions of truth and justice: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the arrest and imprisonment of the two eminent Roman Catholic primates, Archbishop Stepinac, of Yugoslavia, and Cardinal Mindszenty, of Hungary, (a) constitute persecution on account of political and religious beliefs, (b) violate the declaration in the preamble to the Charter of the United Nations, namely: "to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men * * *", and (c) violate the third purpose stated in article I of the Charter of the United Nations, namely: "To achieve international cooperation * * * in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion." It is further the sense of the Congress that the issues raised by such violations should be submitted by the United States to the United Nations at the next meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 16, after the period, strike out all of lines 16 down to and including line 20 and insert the following: "It is further the sense of the Congress that these issues shall be raised by the United States, either in the United Nations or by such other means as may be most appropriate."

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the whole civilized democratic world has been shocked again by the trial of Cardinal Mindszenty. Here again we see the totalitarian technique of using the hollow form of legal procedure to ruthlessly destroy the civil rights of an individual. Here again we see the dignity of a human being violated. We see every principle of democratic procedures, respect for human rights, respect for protective legal procedures, ruthlessly swept aside before the lust for revenge of a totalitarian state.

In view of the demonstration which has recently been perpetrated in Hungary, Catholics and non-Catholics alike must register their disapproval before the bar of world public opinion.

I wish to compliment the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, for presenting to the Congress this resolution upon which we are about to vote, which condemns in no uncertain terms this terrible travesty committed against the two outstanding religious leaders, Archbishop Stepinac and Cardinal Mindszenty.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I support this resolution heartily. I have repeatedly said that communism aims at the destruction of every vestige of the Christian faith. What has happened in this case is merely a part of that effort to destroy Christianity. It is not a fight against any one church. It is backed by the same satanic power that challenged the deity of our Lord in the beginning and that has tried to destroy the soul of man through the ages. Here we see the fruition of the effort to destroy the will and dignity of man. In this mad communistic campaign the fate of all that is near and dear to us is at stake. This is a move to crush light, liberty, and conscience. Wherever religious liberty and Christianity are attacked, it is the direct concern of every Christian in the world. Mr. Speaker, as a young man I took my stand on the side of Christ and Christianity and there I stand.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I strongly favor the present resolution. The trial of Cardinal Mindszenty was, in my opinion, a farce. It represents a new low in human relations for the Soviet and for communism. In this trial there was a denial of freedom of speech, a denial of freedom of the press. The courts have been distorted and justice has become a hollow mockery. This Congress has a right to be upset over the anti-God attitude of the Soviet and I hope this resolution will pass without a dissenting vote.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I favor this resolution condemning the endeavor by terror to suppress religious freedom in Hungary. This threat to religious liberty affects equally people of all faiths everywhere. By this resolution the democratic world will be enabled to make clear to the Communist world the critical importance which it attaches to the trials of Archbishop Stepinac and Cardinal Mindszenty. Men who love freedom everywhere will applaud this act by this House.

I append hereto House Resolution 65 which I offered to the same effect as the resolution now being adopted and I am satisfied that the resolution now being adopted accomplishes the same result.

House Resolution 65

Whereas the democratic world and people everywhere who believe in justice have been profoundly shocked by the summary arrest and imprisonment of His Eminence Josef Cardinal Mindszenty, Roman Catholic Primate of Hungary, and by his being held incommunicado since December 23, 1948; and

Whereas the said arrest and confinement constitute persecution on account of political and religious bias and violate the declaration of the United Nations Charter of "respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms" (article I of the Charter of the United Nations): Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Congress that the arrest and imprisonment of the Roman Catholic Primate of Hungary, His Eminence Josef Cardinal Mindszenty, and his continued confinement incommunicado, amount to deliberate persecution on account of conscience and faith and violate a fundamental freedom guaranteed by the United Nations Charter and by the requirements of justice. It is further the sense of the Congress that the issues raised by such violations due to the actions of the Government of Hungary should be submitted by the United States to the United Nations at the next meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations for appropriate action.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, in these days when a shocked world is awakened by a horrible example of injustice invading the rights of freedom of religion and speech, as was evidenced in the trial of Josef Cardinal Mindszenty, it is most properly fitting that I have secured permission to include at this point the sermon of Archbishop Patrick A. O'Boyle, of Washington, on the trial of the cardinal delivered in St. Matthew's Cathedral, on Sunday, February 6, at the 12:30 o'clock Mass. I take from his words a caption for his sermon:

THE MIMICRY OF JUSTICE

Just 1 month ago I came before you to voice a protestation against the indignity heaped upon a prince of the church in the arrest and imprisonment of His Eminence Josef Cardinal Mindszenty, primate of Hungary. During nearly 6 weeks of imprisonment, not a word about him had come to the wondering world, and no one but his accusers had seen him until he was brought to what is referred to as a trial early last week.

My purpose in returning here today has been determined by the events of that trial and the weird reports that have been coming to us through our only means of communication. That purpose is to warn you insistently against misjudgments, born of the confusion worse confounded that has been produced with malice aforethought, by the sole sources of the news regarding this mimicry of justice now being staged in Hungary. For the fault certainly does not lie with our magnificent American press at all.

This so-called trial had hardly begun when headlines screamed in American newspapers that the cardinal was making "confessions." He was described as repudiating his famous letter written before his imprisonment in which he warned that any future "confessions" must be treated as frauds or wrung from him by torture, and were, therefore, to be disregarded entirely. The story of the trial so far is of a piece with the pattern of the infamous Moscow trials, and courts of justice wherever communism has triumphed. The queer spectacles of Moscow and Warsaw, to cite only two, have long since been stamped as fraudulent farces, travesties upon law and justice among civilized nations. Such trials would indeed be worthy of some laughter if they did not involve human lives and liberties, which were the precious things at stake in such courts of justice.

I cannot help but think to myself of the comparison between this trial in far-off Hungary and that which is presently being conducted in the city of New York. The contrast is enough to embitter a man, for the American principle is affirmed and upheld that a man's innocence must be sustained until beyond reasonable doubt his guilt has been proven on the basis of irrefutable evidence. There has been no secret prison cell for these well-cared-for defendants—there has been no use of drugs to dissolve human personality and wrest confessions as of men in a hypnotic dream—there have been no leading and illegal questions from the presiding judge to the defendants—and there has been no violence or refusal of choice of counsel. Instead there has been the spectacle of a judge leaning over backward to render justice according to American law, uncontaminated justice, even when the very dignity of his court has been outraged by the vocal recklessness of the massed array of legal counsel which fortifies the lines of the defense. It does not make pleasant reading, this exhibition of trifling with American liberality and gracious justice, but it does at least manifest the splendid willingness of American justice to take every single precaution and exhibit patient procedure so that justice may be done and man's rights safeguarded under the law of the land.

Now, consider that outrageously misnamed "trial" in Hungary under Communist inspiration and direction. Its features long ago were prophesied in a bluntly honest American press. Papers here in Washington, in New York, in Boston, and other cities were unanimous in openly ridiculing the future "trial" which would be merely an opportunity provided the cardinal for assenting to his guilt, however that consent was wrung from him by methods worthy of oriental dungeons. The trial, they said, would be the public confirmation of the "guilt" and nothing more.

The cardinal was not unaware of these Communist methods and prepared himself accordingly beforehand in the writing of the letter which bade his hearers to ignore what happened after he had been hurled into prison. The former Premier of Hungary, now a resident of our country, speaks of tortures which conceivably were inflicted upon the cardinal after his arrest—the drugging and the rest of the mistreatment which forced "confessions" from others, followed by a reconditioning to prepare him for public appearance at his "trial." A writer in one of our leading dailies yesterday gave a clear-cut analysis asserting that the use of drugs upon the cardinal was obvious, and based his assertions upon the voice, the manner, and the language of his eminence as the "trial" was broadcast from the courtroom to the nation of Hungary.

Now, unfortunately, these confessions have produced enough confusion during the past week in the minds of American readers, enough to make the Kremlin satisfied with its methods. For what is important to them is not the rightness of their action but the success which it achieves. There has been confusion resulting from these headlines.

First of all, be it well remembered that there is only one American correspondent at this trial. The Hungarian regime refused visas to all other American correspondents. The British Legation of Budapest was denied the courtesy of a representative at the trial. The United States Legation in Budapest was refused the courtesy of an observer. The National Catholic Welfare Conference News Service, which has been accredited to cover news even in Moscow and Warsaw, was also denied admission to the trial. The only news we received during the past week, with one sole exception, comes from Hungarian writers alone, citizens of that stricken country, whose livelihood, whose families, and whose very lives are in jeopardy if they try to report this trial truthfully while writing under the shadow of a Government which is the implacable foe of religion. Do you wonder why, when the iron curtain was drawn around the trial, our news was slanted and the American newspaper could not do much else but print what their only sources sent, leaving it to the wisdom and intelligence of the readers, with editorial direction, to weigh the value of what was set forth in their columns.

It is the old story of the fear of truth, of a free press. But it has produced some confusion which demands a word of clarification at least. For apart from weighing the sources, the truly poisoned and biased sources of this Hungarian news, one has only to contrast the well-known figure of the eminent cardinal before and after this trial began. Only a few short weeks ago, he stood before the world as a giant figure and a thundering voice challenging injustice and violation of human rights. He was marked with a forceful personality, fearless, defiant when he was conscious of a duty to speak and be unafraid. He was well aware, too, of the consequences of his daring to impugn the Government for its lawlessness and indecency toward its citizens. Now, all of a sudden, he appears out of the hidden prison confines, no longer the dominating prince of the church, speaking as a man unafraid, but almost to say as one cringing and exhibiting the indignity of weakness and craven confessions to the most startling crimes, and calmly calling down upon his head the vindictive justice of a cruel and godless Government, the inhuman host of enemies whom before he had assailed as men who were a shame and dishonor to the name of man.

Now the very obvious aim of this Government and the whole vile business of the rigged and fixed trial is to discredit the cardinal in the eyes of his people and of the world. The scheming minds of the Kremlin have succeeded in some measure in throwing dust into the eyes of wondering humanity, who are left gaping at what the truth must actually be. But, for the most part, nobody has been fooled, either by the charges or the sensational revelations of the trial, which to say the least, are outrages upon common sense itself, if not silly obscenities unworthy of intelligent consideration. Unfortunately, they suffice for a Communist government to commit a man to prison or even to death itself as providing the legal basis for doing so. I think, on the whole, the world has not been misled by these atrocious lies and the heartless and unholy defamation of the character of the cardinal—I think, too, that nobody in his right mind can fail to perceive the utter fraud of the whole fearful farce which moves on to the end of destroying the utility of the cardinal as a God-given spokesman of the people in the defense and vindication of their human rights.

I have no intention of criticizing the fine American press alert to the fraud and infamy of the whole procedure. Its headlines state what the dispatches from Communist sources contain but for those who do not read beyond the headlines, there is danger that misunderstanding may ensue, and that would be ruinous.

To those who know the cardinal—I have met him myself three times—there is the recollection of a strong and fearless man, undaunted, and filled with a violent sense of justice. The change which must have taken place in such a man is a revelation, not of weakness in him, God knows, but of the unknown terrors or drugs to which he must have been subjected and which to all appearances have left him another kind of man from the one who braved the penalties invoked against him for the sake of the truth and for the victory of justice. We cannot allow ourselves to forget that stark and well-considered statement of his that no confession made after his arrest was to be considered his word—his truthful and free word—for he knew the diabolical malice and treachery he was soon to meet in the hidden silences of the prison. What went on there no one can say; but it is not difficult in the light of past performances of the same kind to know what the cardinal in silence endured.

The last sorry word came yesterday with the closing of the defense and the ludicrous apology of the defense counsel for the errors of his eminent client and the "hurts which he brought upon his country." That is the last straw in a great pile of foul straw. It is the descent to the lowest of indignities, but it is strictly conformable to Communist administration of justice, which has as its primary purpose the ridicule of a person and his degradation in the eyes of his fellow men, and then heaping insult upon injury, to thrust him forth as a coward and weakling for the defamation of his fellow citizens. It is nothing less than the moral destruction of an individual carried out in public and fortified by what is described as the process of law.

The Vatican has called this a pathological performance. That is a splendid name for the whole sorry mess. It is indeed a diseased and cancerous manifestation without legal health or human values. We know the lies and the deceits and the treachery, we Americans, for we have also been the subjects of Communist fraudulence. We have learned it, alas, when it has been written for us in the blood of every man who has died in the airlift to stricken Berlin, the attestations in blood and life of Communist trickery and Communist lies. We have our trustfulness as a people and a nation of freemen, and we have no desire to become distrustful when trust is warranted by every rational sign. But there is not one basic cause for trusting Communists on anything that has to do with virtue or moral principle—they have none; in what concerns basic law and just juridical process they acknowledge none; in safeguarding human rights and dignity they are worthy of no trust at all. It is as if reason itself has been dethroned to make way for the triumph of the Father of Lies. These are harsh words, but stern truth, and they can be documented from day to day in the history of the last few years of experience with Communist governments.

In conclusion, I remind you again that what happened in Budapest was not a trial, for a trial is a proceeding justly conducted in accordance with law as recognized by the civilized world. This proceeding violates the preamble and article I of the Charter of the United Nations and also the Hungarian Peace Treaty for it amounts to persecution for religious beliefs. This mock trial is a brazen attempt to conceal the ultimate purpose of destroying all organized opposition of the Communist Party in Hungary by hypocritically using the device of the judicial process, and to discredit abroad a friend of the United States and a prelate of the Catholic Church.

Cardinal Mindszenty is not guilty of any crime nor of any moral wrong. Press reports that he had pleaded guilty or partly guilty did not mean under Hungarian legal procedure that he had admitted criminal guilt, as would have been the case under Anglo-American law. It meant that he had courageously reiterated his defense of Christian principles and his fierce opposition to a philosophy that every right, moral and legal, proceeds from the state. It meant that he proclaimed his unshakable belief in basic human freedoms, freedoms which have given us the priceless heritage of our American civilization. The employment of empty legal forms and a legalistic vocabulary unrelated to the concept of justice will avail the Red terror in Hungary naught.

Like St. Thomas More, St. John Fisher, and other great heroes of old, who fell victims to the ruthless hand of political power, which admitted no higher law than its own unbridled will, Cardinal Mindszenty will stand forth in the memory of mankind, both now and in the future, as a symbol of great moral courage, a champion of justice, and a defender of the faith.

Americans and all lovers of democratic government may well shudder in revulsion at such travesties as this trial. For us Catholics, there remains the practical spiritual duty of lifting up our voices against oppression wherever it may be—and lifting up our hearts in prayer for those who suffer injustice for justice's sake—in prayer for the shamefully disordered world in which such heroism for the love of man and the love of Christ must still be exacted.

Pray then for this magnificent servant of God and the church and mankind. For he is a brave citizen known to all the world, and the world suffers in his silent passion. And remember—as you look upon his face in the daily papers, standing in the dock, while, not far away from him, millions of oppressed people rot in concentration camps, his fellow victims for whom he fought the good fight, remember that he represents in his person, thus dishonored and defamed, human dignity that is crowned with thorns, justice that is scourged at the pillar of infamy, and human liberty that is nailed upon a cross.

And now, Mr. Speaker, under the same permission granted me, I conclude with Archbishop Patrick A. O'Boyle's statement to the press on Josef Cardinal Mindszenty's sentence:

The Hungarian court crucified justice. The craven cowards in the face of world protest were afraid to pursue the premeditated murder of Cardinal Mindszenty. A great champion of human freedom and human rights had no chance with a government that acknowledges neither the majesty of God or the rights of man. May our Divine Lord and His Blessed Mother sustain the cardinal with fortitude in the face of the unknown trials still before him. We shall always remember him in our prayers and we respectfully ask all to pray for him.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, at the outset I extend my compliments to and sincerely thank the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM], chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, for his splendid cooperation and prompt work in bringing this resolution to the floor of the House for a vote.

I have been concerned for a long time now with the imprisonment of Archbishop Aloysius Stepinac after a trial which was a travesty on justice and offensive to democratic ideals of freedom and fair play and in complete disregard of the preamble and purposes of the Charter of the United Nations. On the opening day of the Eightieth Congress, in January of 1947, I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 4, expressing disapproval of Archbishop Stepinac's trial, held in Zagreb, Yugoslavia, on October 11, 1946, which resulted not only in the imprisonment of the archbishop for a term of 16 years but of other priests of the Catholic Church for varying terms of years. Although I diligently persisted in trying to obtain action on that resolution during the entire term of the Eightieth Congress I was unsuccessful in my efforts. I cannot help but speculate that if prompt action had been taken at that time we might not be here this evening considering the pending resolution insofar as it applies to the horrible injustice done to Josef Cardinal Mindszenty by the Communist government of Hungary.

On the opening day of the present Congress, January 3, 1949, I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 9, protesting the barbarism of the Communist government of Yugoslavia in the case of Archbishop Stepinac and also on the same day introduced a resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 8, protesting the arrest and imprisonment of Josef Cardinal Mindszenty by the Communist government of Hungary.

I am pleased to be able to say that we did not have to wait as long as in the last Congress for action on either of these resolutions. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] was kind enough on January 18, 1949, to introduce a resolution covering both the Archbishop Stepinac and Cardinal Mindszenty matters which was marked House Concurrent Resolution 19 and which is now before us for consideration.

I have discussed this matter with Secretary of State Acheson and commend him for the statement that his Department is fully aware of the significance of the ruthless attacks occurring in Hungary and Yugoslavia against religious and political liberties, which have culminated in the persecution of the two eminent church dignitaries. As far back as October 11, 1946, as Under Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson expressed the concern of our Government over the impairment in Communist Yugoslavia of freedom of religion and worship and other civil liberties, in connection with the trial and conviction of Archbishop Stepinac.

The citizens of America are aroused over what has been done to religion and the religious in these Communist-dominated countries. I have received thousands upon thousands of communications from Protestants, Jews, and Catholics protesting the vicious acts of the murderers and cutthroat gangsters who now rule Hungary and Yugoslavia.

It is apparent that the war between Christianity and atheism is on. I am sure that not a single Member of this House will fail to take up the cudgels against the destruction of religion and the spread of atheism by objecting to unanimous passage of the pending resolution.

The thoughts in the minds of the people of Brooklyn on this subject are reflected in the following editorial which was published in the Brooklyn Eagle of Monday, February 7, 1949, entitled "Reds' Trial of Cardinal Is a Travesty on Justice":

REDS' TRIAL OF CARDINAL IS A TRAVESTY ON JUSTICE

The "trial" of Cardinal Mindszenty in Hungary deserves the impartial attention of every man and woman in the world. From the circumstances of the case and the contentions of reliable sources the prosecution of this leading anti-Communist leader seems to be little short of diabolical.

The Reverend Gedeon Peterffy, rector of the Hungarian Pontifical Institute in Rome, declared, in a recent dispatch from that city, that the so-called confession of the cardinal is so crude and filled with grammatical inaccuracies that it could not possibly have been written by the prelate except under duress.

The absurd suggestion of the indicted cardinal in the courtroom that the trial should be called off so that he might now work for a peaceful collaboration with the Communist-usurped government lends weight to the presumption that he had been drugged and was still acting under the influence of an abnormal condition.

To assent to such a possibility would under ordinary circumstances seem to be a surrender to the melodramatic in the hope of satisfying one's search for an answer to the riddle. The word will not down, however, that torture and drugs have been used upon the cardinal.

The first reports of his apparently normal appearance and seeming normal responses in the courtroom are not so clear in the light of later dispatches. The correspondent of the New York Times, who was allowed into the trial only in its closing hours on Friday night, did not verify the earlier dispatches. To him the cardinal had deep rings under his eyes and his words were uttered in a listless way like one repeating something memorized and spoken over and over again. Normally he was a man of vigor—almost theatrical in his speech.

Knowing the character and the reputations of the two parties concerned—the Communist judges and the one man who now stands between them and complete subjugation of the Catholic population of Hungary, one cannot casually accept the garbled and confused bits of information so far available as evidence.

This man has stood up against, not only the Communist usurpers, but their Nazi prototypes. He has suffered valiantly under both regimes. He had warned his fellow bishops to discount any confession that might possibly be extracted from him in the future. The Vatican, which undoubtedly knows the true convictions of its Hungarian representative, stands by the original statements of the cardinal and refuses to accept the recantation as anything but a forced, involuntary admission.

On the other hand, there is no evidence that any Communist regime in any of these public trials has ever followed the norms of justice. The verdict is already sealed before the trial begins. The presiding officer is judge, jury, and prosecutor.

From all the accounts of the trial we cannot fail to reach the conclusion that it is a Communist frame-up—and it is certainly in line with the Reds' long record of deceit, barbarism, and injustice. The Mindszenty case is a travesty on justice.

On the same day the Brooklyn Eagle also contained the following article headed "The world after the war," by Constantine Brown, which shows the low degree of depravity to which the officials of the Soviet Union have descended:

THE WORLD AFTER THE WAR

(By Constantine Brown)

POWERFUL DRUG BELIEVED GIVEN MINDSZENTY TO GET CONFESSION

A powerful drug known as actedron is believed to have been administered to Cardinal Mindszenty by the Soviet-organized Hungarian secret police. This drug paralyzes all will power and the person thus drugged says anything he is told to say.

It is definitely established that the people's court set up by Marshal Tito in Yugoslavia used the same drug to make Gen. Draja Mihailovich, the nation's hero, admit that he had been a traitor to his country.

According to the testimony of those who attended the trial—and the Yugoslavs were more liberal with permits for foreigners than the Hungarian Government is—the Chetnik leader stated after a hearing: "I do not know what has come over me. Whenever I want to say 'No,' I find myself saying 'Yes.'"

The Soviet Union's MVD (secret police) takes credit for the development of this drug and its employment in state trials. It became known to the various intelligence services of the Western Powers during the spectacular purge trials in Moscow in 1936, when many of those who helped found the Soviet state worked against the Soviet government and confessed that they worked against the Soviet government and plotted with Leon Trotsky for its overthrow.

The drug was later used with even greater effect by the Gestapo, not in public trials but in obtaining important admissions from its victims.

Cardinal Mindszenty fought openly against Moscow's puppets in Hungary. This he admitted before being taken into custody by the Hungarian secret police. The Hungarian Government—even the present one, which is entirely under the domination of Moscow's agents—hesitated to arrest a prince of the church, against whom there was not the least evidence of treason, in the accepted meaning of the word.

Moscow decided, according to well-founded reports received in Washington, to proceed against the cardinal only after it found that the Cominform had stuck its neck way out in its conflict with Marshal Tito, of Yugoslavia.

The Communist government in Budapest tried to warn him of what would happen to him, in the hope of quieting the eloquent cardinal. But these warnings were answered with the words: "There is no time limit for martyrdom for the faith and well-being of the human race."

Because it was essential, according to the Soviet system of justice, to expose the enemies of the state by confessions from their mouths, the actedron treatment was given the cardinal. The effect has been gratifying to the U. S. S. R. secret police.

With his will power broken by the drug, the cardinal admitted everything he was told to admit and made a number of reservations about his activities in keeping with the wishes of his torturers, who wanted to give the appearance of a fair trial to their masquerade of justice.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, although the pending resolution does not go as far as I would like it to go, I am confident that it is the first worth-while step in a matter in which every American citizen is vitally concerned. I personally feel that we should immediately sever all diplomatic relations with the Communist Government of Hungary. Again permit me to commend the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] for his prompt and kindly cooperation and for the time he has given me personally in connection with this matter. When all the Members of this House this evening pass this resolution, as I know they will, they notify all the peoples of the world of their righteous indignation over the barbaric treatment accorded Archbishop Stepinac and Josef Cardinal Mindszenty.

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, the farcical trial of Josef Cardinal Mindszenty, Hungarian primate, presents a graphic picture of atheistic materialism ruthlessly challenging every concept of Christian American democracy.

It is factual evidence of a determined, godless assault, by anti-Christian tyranny, against any church or people refusing to accept communistic dictatorship.

This latest outrage appears to be one more example in revelation of a resolute program to either completely extinguish Christianity in eastern Europe or accomplish its ineffectualness, in a moral sense.

For us in America, it should serve as another warning that the survival of personal dignity and human rights, in the Christian tradition, is the question mark of modern world developments. For our own protection we must remain constantly alert to detect insidious communistic undermining in our country and unite, in protest, against their pagan perpetrations abroad.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the resolution.

Mr. Speaker, the voice of the American people rises in its freedom to protest this Communist crime against religion and humanity. Let this be a clarion call for a new international crusade against communism. Were it not for the fact that the results of this despicable trial will echo down through the corridors of time as one of the great infamies in the history of the world, then indeed this stage-managed trial, with all of its ridiculous, but tragic details, would have been truly a farce. Let it be said here and now that the chief, and the first, and the primary object of atheistic communism is the destruction of Christianity. This infamous trial was used by the Russians and their Hungarian satellites as a weapon in a determined effort to intimidate the Hungarian people and to break the power of the Catholic Church in Hungary. Every other means that could come to their perverted minds, having failed to conquer the brave Hungarian people, the Russians now are fully embarked on a campaign of terrorism to destroy their existence.

In this great forum of freedom let me call to your attention once again the great moral and ethical principles that catholicism upholds, and that communism is trying to undermine. Let us tear aside the veil of mystery that has surrounded many of the aspects of the trial of Cardinal Mindszenty. By this disregard of personal, political, and religious liberty in Hungary, the Soviet controlled Hungarian authorities have violated the peace treaty which calls for the observance of human, political, and religious rights and freedom.

It has been written: "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's." But in this Communist-dominated state, this true saying has been tortured to read: "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto Caesar the things that are God's."

There is no reason to ignore what is going on behind the iron curtain, for the evidence is overwhelming.

This evidence is provided not only by the faith of Cardinal Mindszenty, but also by the faith of those who preceded him. By Archbishop Stepinac, of Yugoslavia, by the priests, and pastors of many denominations, not only Catholics, who have been executed or thrown into prison in both states under Communist domination. Additional evidence is given by the numerous diplomats, consuls, and officials, who have resigned their posts abroad in protest against the policies of their home government, including the nine Hungarian officials, headed by the consul general in New York, who this week resigned from their government service. The evidence piles up and increases one upon the other. There is the vast wave of refugees from behind the iron curtain who are now numbered by the hundreds of thousands. They have fled and are still fleeing at the risk of their lives to escape a terror which many of them have experienced in Communist prisons and concentration camps. The democratic world can no longer ignore such evidence.

The Communist Hungarian Government has undertaken to conduct a campaign hoping to cause the people of Hungary and of the surrounding nations to lose faith in their religious leaders and in religion. Trials of this nature are a mockery of truth and justice.

It must be remembered that when Cardinal Mindszenty was free he had warned intimates and members of the clergy not to believe statements that he might make if and when he was arrested. As long as 2 years ago, when on a visit to the United States, the cardinal made this clear, for at that time when asked why he was returning, he declared because it was his duty to his people and his God. The cardinal said further, "I am going back to be crucified." And again, "My enemies can take from me no more than my life and that has already been given to God."

In assurance that we will not be lulled again into a false sense of security or a general apathy, let us not forget that we speak also of the case of Archbishop Aloysius Stepinac, who was sentenced by Yugoslavia in 1946 to 16 years in prison. This action we demand in his behalf as well as Cardinal Mindszenty's. Before the councils of the nations of the world, these sovereign powers must bear full responsibility for their actions. There should be no procedural problem in bringing this question before the United Nations. It should be the privilege of the United States delegation to bring this matter to the attention of the United Nations. This could be done in any one of three ways, in my judgment. First, through reference to the International Court of Justice, although it may be true that Hungary is not a member. Another possibility is reference to the Economic and Social Council or its subsidiary commission on human rights. A third possibility is the General Assembly itself, which meets again this year in April in New York. But regardless of these procedural suggestions, there is still the fact that the terms of the Hungarian peace treaty itself provides the best solution, for that treaty contains specific provisions on guaranties of human rights and democratic processes and the Hungarian Government is under obligation to obey.

Mr. Speaker, I have had the privilege and the high honor of serving for some years in this Congress, and during these years of being of other service to my community, my State, and my country. But may I say that nothing in my private or public life ever incensed me as much as the shameful and degrading action of the Government of Hungary in the trial of Cardinal Mindszenty. The charge involving our own American Minister, Mr. Chapin, is a direct insult to the Government of the United States and is a cause for diplomatic action.

I realize full well that it is not always good diplomacy, and sometimes not advisable for our sources of information, to break relations with foreign nations. However, under the circumstances of this case, so extenuating, the resignation of Hungarian diplomatic officers in this country is evidence to the world that even they cannot stomach the disgraceful and bestial action of their own government for which they are accredited.

These two facts alone should constitute ample grounds for the withdrawal of our representatives in Hungary and the absolute severance of diplomatic relations with that country.

This is not just a problem for the United States. The whole world is shocked and astounded at this unjust and improper trial. This religious persecution is an outrage against people of all faiths everywhere. This is an indication of what may be anticipated in Communist-controlled countries and is a stark warning of the spread of tyranny and oppression among free people.

It it admirable that these men of God are sacrificed as the victims of their faith. Contrast this with the unenviable lot that is doomed to be that of their tormentors. To die before the wrath of Almighty God as rebuke of their own ambition. How great was the set-back for communism in these proceedings is graphically illustrated by the fact that comparatively few knew who Josef Mindszenty was until his arrest and trial. Today his name is a household word, honored and respected as his persecutors are debased and despised. Mr. Speaker, well it can be said "who falls for the love of God shall rise a star."

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegram:

WILKES-BARRE, PA.,
February 6, 1949.

Hon. DANIEL J. FLOOD,
House of Representatives,

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FLOOD: The following resolution was passed at regular monthly meeting of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, division 37, Wilkes-Barre, meeting at Redington Hotel, Wilkes-Barre, Sunday, February 6, 1949:

"The above-named organization protests violently the indignities suffered by Josef Cardinal Mindszenty, of Bucharest, Hungary, and six other codefendants being tried by a Russian Hungarian people's court. Also we protest the denial by Hungarian Government of the presence of United States official representatives at this said trial."

Kindly employ your potent influence to present this protest in the Congress of the United States.

Yours truly,

JOHN J. KANE,
Secretary.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the mock trial, conviction, and sentence to life imprisonment of Cardinal Mindszenty is without parallel in history. No happening of our time more clearly indicates the determination of the Communists to attempt to obliterate their real enemy—Christianity.

His supposed trial violates every elementary principle of justice. It resembles in all details the purge trials held in the Soviet Union sometime back. The Communist government in Hungary has not even permitted American correspondents or observers to witness the trial. This means that the reports are slanted to suit the Communist propaganda line. However, I was extremely gratified that the State Department instructed the American Minister at Budapest to protest the exclusion of observers. I am further gratified by the strong and straightforward expression of yesterday by the Secretary of State.

No greater contrast between democracy and communism can be found than in this farce trial of a great leader of Christianity and in the trial of the 12 Communists in the city of New York. The latter group, leaders of a movement dedicated to the destruction of our Government, has been afforded all of the protection of the great American system of justice, while an outstanding leader of Christianity is denied the rights accorded a common criminal in our country.

The statements which have been reported through the Hungarian censor give every evidence of the accuracy of the charge that the cardinal has been maltreated. This trial is clear warning of the fate of Christianity under communism.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include editorial comments and news stories:

BUDAPEST TRIAL

The pattern for Sovietland trials of those under charges of conspiring against any Kremlin-controlled regime is by now pretty well fixed. It was set in the middle thirties by the Russian blood purge. It followed the same dreary routine in the cases of Gen. Draja Mihailovich and Archbishop Stepinac in Yugoslavia, or Zoltan Tildy in Hungary.

That Josef Cardinal Mindszenty, of Hungary, would be found guilty of treason was, therefore, a foregone conclusion. The imposition of a life sentence rather than the death penalty may well have been a concession to world opinion, already incensed over so obvious a mockery of judicial procedure.

In this instance suspicion about the conduct of the trial was strengthened by the refusal of Matias Rakosi's puppet government to permit any outside and presumably unprejudiced newspapermen or any foreign diplomatic observers to attend. No such efforts to conceal what is going on are likely to be made unless there is something important to hide.

Much was made of the assertion that the dispatches sent out about the trial by the Budapest correspondent of the Associated Press were uncensored. This correspondent is a Hungarian national, subject to the inexorable discipline of a Cominform-controlled administration. Citing that as evidence of a free flow of information is like boasting that what Ilya Ehrenberg writes from Moscow is uncensored.

We don't know whether Cardinal Mindszenty was guilty or innocent of the charges lodged against him by the Ragosi administration. But we feel certain that his trial was a farcical mockery of judicial procedure, and not a dispassionate inquiry into the truth of the accusations.

REBELLION TO TYRANTS

Last Sunday was set aside by American Catholics as a day of "prayer and protest" against the Communists' trial of Cardinal Mindszenty. In Manhattan's St. Patrick's Cathedral, Francis Cardinal Spellman—who received his red hat with Mindszenty at the 1946 consistory—delivered a remarkable sermon:

"'A new god has come to you, my people. His fiery eyes do not flash through clouds of incense or from altar candles. * * * This new god is not a stone statue worn smooth by the kisses of the faithful—he was not born in heaven. * * * The new god is born from earth and blood—he strides ahead, and under the thunder of his steps the globe trembles from east to west. This is the Red god. The Seine shudders at his impact, and tries to break its banks. Westminster trembles before him like Jericho, and across the green ocean his red shadow falls on the walls of the White House. Hosanna! New god.'

"My dear friends, [these] are words of a Hungarian Communist,[1] words that echo the thoughts of men depraved and deranged—men who do not know truth, love, justice, or faith. * * * These lines * * * are taught to the youth of Red-enshackled lands * * * where everybody is afraid of everybody else, where even a son fears his father and fathers fear their own blood-sons, as all become serfs and victims of the relentless god of Baal! * * * They are wild words of warning, and, unless we listen well and realize that we must counteract them by concerted, constant prayer and action, then these words but foretell America's and the whole world's doom.

"May 8, 1945—VE-day! On that day I delivered from this pulpit a prayer of thanksgiving for the victory of the hour, begging peace with justice. * * * The peace that came was not God's peace; and because in the ensuing postwar years men's hearts have not been won back to God, I must this day—as a protest against the crucification of humanity—entreat your prayers for persecuted, tortured, victimized Cardinal Mindszenty.

IT IS FULL TIME

"From the very hour he was taken away in the black of night from his home, his flock, his aged mother, Cardinal Mindszenty became the victim of torturings and druggings that put him beyond the reach or realm of human help. It was he himself who said to me, when he was the honored guest here less than 2 years ago, 'My enemies can take from me no more than my life, and that has already been given to God.'

"No, the physical Cardinal Mindszenty can no longer be saved. It is the spiritual Cardinal Mindszenty in his martyrdom of mind and body that we can fortify by our prayers, that in his soul he may know that in another part of the world other men are holding high God's torch of justice. * * * and in our own dear land each free man * * * must protect and fight to keep his own integrity of conscience, his own God-given freedoms * * * to save America and the rest of the democratic, God-loving world from trickery, torturings, disasters, and defeat. * * *

"I shall never cease to pray and labor to protect America, and warn and work against Communism and all the evils growing from out its rotted roots, for I believe that 'rebellion to tyrants is obedience to God.'

"I [have] witnessed the sufferings of men in a world trapped by fear, famine, and madness called communism * * * I avow that unless the whole American people, without further ostrichlike actions and pretenses, unite to stop the Communist floodings of our own land, our sons, for the third and last time, shall be summoned * * * to bear arms against those who would desecrate and destroy them. Yea, it is full time that a strong and vigilant America unite in prayer and protest.

IF THIS BE TREASON

"Therefore, I beg you, my beloved people, let us not confuse prudence with lack of vision * * * as we watch nation after nation fall victim to communism, for prudence is often but an excuse for silence, procrastination, and compromise. Even today, as we read newspaper releases from the Communist-controlled press of Budapest * * * about a cardinal priest, whom, so little time ago, we took unto our own hearts and homes, millions of Americans refuse to recognize that we ourselves are faced with these same merciless dangers. * * * The Communists believe the American public is * * * willing to be drugged into believing whatever leaves them their own comforts. * * * But are we * * * the tools and the fools for which the Communists take us?

"When the cardinal confessed to treason against the government in Hungary, he but professed his loyalty to his country. If this be treason, to deny allegiance to an atheistic Communist government—then thank God Cardinal Mindszenty confessed to treason, as would I, if this free land of America were ever conquered."

THE TRIAL OF CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

The trial of Josef Cardinal Mindszenty is over and the verdict has been brought in by the Communist-dominated government of Hungary.

Whether that verdict will ultimately stand will not be known until the appeals are decided.

What is already known is the farcical manner in which the trial was conducted.

Consider these points:

No outsider was allowed to cover the trial. All extra news-service reporters were refused entry. The Associated Press man covering the trial is a Hungarian.

[1] Arpad Toth, a journalist and music critic.

No American observer was allowed to be present. The United States had requested three seats.

Evidence was offered that the cardinal had conspired with Selden Chapin, United States Minister at Budapest, to hire a plane and escape Hungary. Both Mr. Chapin and the State Department have denied this.

The cardinal, while on trial, repudiated a prior letter which warned that if any confession were extracted from him it would be due to "human frailty."

The testimony of the cardinal, as printed here, was obscure even in its self-accusations.

The reports made a particular point of stressing the cardinal's health, well-being, and bearing. Yet as long as 3 weeks ago, this newspaper carried a New York Times exclusive story that the cardinal doubtless would be drugged so that he would be spiritless and malleable.

And just Saturday, a dispatch from John MacCormac, of the Times, reported that listeners in Vienna who were familiar with the cardinal and other defendants "have no doubt that all are under the influence of drugs."

"This," he wrote, "is deduced from the tone of the voices; frequent lapses of memory, faulty grammar used by men who would ordinarily be incapable of it, and by comparison of the cardinal's handwriting as reproduced in the yellow book (the Hungarian charges) with his ordinary script."

Trials such as these are not uncommon in totalitarian lands. During 1936-38, a number of Communist leaders went on trial for treason. Among them was Marshal Tukachevsky, once second in command of the Red army.

They were charged with conspiring with Nazi Germany—with which Stalin himself signed a nonaggression pact in 1939—to overthrow the Russian Government. Most of the old Bolshevik leaders were followers of the exiled Trotsky, later murdered in Mexico. Opinion at that time was that Stalin was simply consolidating his own power by liquidating his domestic opponents.

At the trial, the accused admitted their guilt, upbraided themselves as traitors to Russia and the proletariat. But their manner of confession and self-accusation was completely out of character for these once self-sufficient men. They attempted no defense, they were clay in the hands of the potter.

Even earlier, in 1933, the Nazis tried a Dutch Communist, Van der Lubbe, for firing the Reichstag. During his trial he acted as though drugged. He agreed to everything told him.

There is similarity in all these trials, and a difference. Van der Lubbe's was the German internal warfare between nazism and communism. Tukachevsky's was dissension in Russia. Cardinal Mindszenty's is a bold challenge of the godless to all faiths and all other creeds.

ACHESON HITS CONVICTION OF CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

(By John M. Hightower)

Secretary of State Dean Acheson yesterday coldly condemned Hungary's conviction of Cardinal Mindszenty as wanton Communist religious persecution which has sickened and horrified the free world.

The United States, he disclosed, is already considering possible action through the United Nations.

Britain and France are being consulted on the next move.

On Capitol Hill, the House Foreign Affairs Committee formally demanded intervention by the United Nations or by such other means as may be most appropriate.

Later the House unanimously adopted a resolution urging that the United States protest Hungary's treatment of the cardinal either through the United Nations or by other appropriate means.

The resolution goes to the Senate.

Acheson's blunt and angry condemnation of Hungary, setting forth the official American position, came at a news conference.

NOT MEMBER OF UN

Diplomatic officials said it was one of the most extensive indictments of a Russian satellite country ever to come from an American Cabinet member.

Acheson noted that Hungary is not a member of the United Nations. But he said the Soviet-controlled country is definitely bound by the obligations set forth in article 2 of the treaty of peace with Hungary.

And on the basis of this treaty, which guarantees freedom and human rights, Acheson said the United States may bring violation charges in the United Nations.

In a terse 300-word statement, Acheson made these salient accusations:

1. Hungarian authorities are Soviet controlled and are seeking to discredit and coerce religious leadership in Hungary in order to remove this source of moral resistance to communism.

That was one of the strongest charges yet made by responsible American officials that the hand of Moscow is manipulating Hungary's actions behind the scenes.

2. In the trial of Cardinal Mindszenty, Hungarian authorities apparently employed all the usual methods practiced by a police state and therefore carried out not the administration of justice but wanton persecution. That was as close as Acheson came to subscribing to accusations of torture, use of drugs, and other tactics with which the Hungarians have been charged in the Mindszenty case.

3. The Hungarian Government must bear full responsibility for its action in the case. This laid the basis for future, more vigorous action by the United States against Hungary, possibly the appeal to the UN.

4. The Mindszenty case and the cases of other Communist-convicted church leaders fit into a deliberate pattern of the suppression of freedom and the extension of totalitarian controls over the country during the past 2 years.

The Hungarian people "have been divested of any real independence," Acheson said.

SICKENED AND HORRIFIED

"The people of the United States," he continued, "and, without question, peoples of other freedom-loving nations, are sickened and horrified by these developments and fully comprehend the threat they constitute to free institutions everywhere."

Acheson referred also to the recent persecution of Lutheran Bishop Lajos Ordass and other church leaders whom he did not name.

Bishop Ordass was arrested September 8 last year and sentenced 21 days later by a workers' court to 2 years in prison and loss of civil rights for 5 years. He was bishop of the Lutheran Church in Hungary and had been accused of violating currency laws.

Mindszenty, the Roman Catholic primate of Hungary, was accused by the Communist government of treason, black marketing, and other offenses.
